3. The liquor made by a solution of chocolate in hot water.

Chocolate is certainly much the best of these three exotic liquors: its oil seems to be both rich, alimentary, and anodyne. Arbutnot on Aliments.

In fumes of burning chocolate shall glow,

CHOCOLATE-HOUSE. n. s. [chocolate and house.] A house where company is entertained with chocolate.

Ever since that time, Lisander has been twice a day at the chocolate-house. Tatler.

CHODE. [the old preterite, from chide.] See CHIDE.

And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban. Genesis, xxxi. 36.

CHOICE.† n. s. [choix, French, according to Dr. Johnson; but it is rather from the Sax. ceorun, ciran, to choose.]

1. The act of choosing; determination between different things proposed; election.

If you oblige me suddenly to chuse,
The choice is made; for I must both refuse. Dryden.

Soft elocution doth thy style renown,
Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies, or to lash at vice. Dryden, Persius.

2. The power of choosing; election.

Choice there is not, unless the thing which we take to be so in our power, that we might have refused it. If fire consume the stable, it chooseth not so to do, because the nature thereof is such that it can do no other. Hooker.

There's no liberty like the freedom of having it at my own choicer, whether I will live to the world, or to myself.

L'Estrange.

To talk of compelling a man to be good, is a contradiction; for where there is force, there can be no choice. Whereas all moral goodness consisteth in the elective act of the understanding will. Grew's Cosmol.

Whether he will remove his contemplation from one idea to another, is many times in his choice. Locke.

3. Care in choosing; curiosity of distinction.

Julius Caesar did write a collection of apophthegms: it is pity his book is lost; for I imagine they were collected with judgment and choice. Bacon, Apophthegms.

4. The thing chosen; the thing taken or approved, in preference to others.

Your choice is not so rich in birth as beauty: That you might well enjoy her, Shakspeare.

Take to thee, from among the cherubim, Thy choice of flaming warriors. Milton, P. L.

Now Mars, she said, let fame exalt her voice; Nor let thy conquests only be her choice. Prior.

5. The best part of any thing, that is more properly the object of choice.

The choicer and flower of all things profitable in other books, the psalms do both more briefly contain, and more movingly also express. Hooker.

Thou art a mighty prince: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead. Genesis, xxiii. 6.

Their riders, the flower and choicer Of many provinces, from bound to bound. Milton, P. R.

6. Several things proposed at once, as objects of judgment and election.

A braver choicer of dauntless spirits, Did never float upon the swelling tide. Shakspeare.

7. To make CHOICE of. • To choose; to take from several things proposed.

Wisdom, of what herself approves, makes choicer, Nor is led captive by the common voice. Denham.

CHOICE. adj. [choisi, French.]

1. Select; of extraordinary value.

After having set before the king the choicest of wines and fruits, he told him the best part of his entertainment was to come. Guardian.

Thus in a sea of folly toss'd, My choicest hours of life are lost. Swift.

2. Chary; frugal; careful. Used of persons.

He that is choicer of his time, will also be choicer of his company, and choicer of his actions. Bp. Taylor's Holy Diving.

CHOICE-DRAWN. * part. adj. [from choice and draw.]

Selected with particular care.

For who is he, whose chin is but enrich'd With one appearing hair, that will not follow These cull'd and choice-drawn cavaliers of France? Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

CHO'ICELESS. adj. [from choice.] Without the power of choosing; without right of choice; not free.

Neither the weight of the matter, of which the cylinder is made, nor the round voluble form of it, are any more imputable to that dead choiceless creature, than the first motion of it; and, therefore, it cannot be a fit resemblance to shew the reconcilableness of fate with choice. Hammond.

CHOI'CELY. adv. [from choicer.]

1. Curiously; with exact choice.

A band of men, Collected choicely from each county some. Shakspeare.

2. Valuably; excellently.

It is certain it is choicely good. Wallon's Angler

CHO'ICENESS. † n. s. [from choice.] Nicety; particular value.

Make exact animadversion where style hath degenerated, where flourished and thrived in choiceness of phrase.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

It seemeth the fire is so choked, as not to be able to remove the stone. Baron, Nat. Hist.

You must make the mould big enough to contain the whole fruit, when it is grown to the greatest; for else you will choke the spreading of the fruit. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The fire, which chok'd in ashes lay, A load too heavy for his soul to move, Was upward blown below, and brush'd away by love. Dryden.

4. To suppress.

And yet we ventur'd; for the gain propos'd Chok'd the respect of likely peril fear'd. Shakspeare.

Confess thee freely of thy sin: For to deny each article with oath, Cannot remove nor choke the strong conception That I do groan withal. Shakspeare.

5. To overpower.

And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection. St. Luke, viii. 14.

No fruitful crop the sickly fields return; But oats and darnel choke the rising corn. Dryden, Past.

CHIOKE.† n. s. [from the verb, or perhaps from the Ital. ciocco, a lock of hair. See ARTICHOKE.] The filamentous or capillary part of an artichoke. A cant word.

CHIOKE-FULL.* adj. [from choke and full. Corruptly pronounced chuck-full.] Filled, so as to leave no more room.

We filled the skins choke full. Bruce's Travels, iv. 549.

CHIOKE-PEAR.† n. s. [from choke and pear.]

1. A rough, harsh, unpalatable pear.
2. Any aspersion or sarcasm, by which another is put to silence. A low term, Dr. Johnson says, in citing the passage from Richardson's Clarissa. But it is a phrase of a century's date, at least, beyond Richardson.

After your goodly and vain-glorious banquet,
I'll give you a choke-pear. Webster, Trag. of the White Devil.
Pardon me for going so low as to talk of giving choke-pears.
Clarissa.

CHIO'KER.† n. s. [from choke.]

1. One that chokes or suffocates another.
2. One that puts another to silence.
3. Any thing that cannot be answered.

CHOLER. n. s. [cholera, Lat. from χολή.]

1. The bile.

There would be a main defect, if such a feeding animal, and so subject unto diseases from bilious causes, should want a proper conveyance for choler. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Marellius Tacimus increase these proportions, adding two more of pure choler. Wotton on Education.

2. The humour, which, by its super-abundance, is supposed to produce irascibility.

It engenders choler, planteth anger;
And better 'twere that both of us did fast,
Since, of ourselves, ourselves are choleric,
Than feed it with such over-roasted flesh. Shakspeare.

3. Anger; rage.

Put him to choler straight: he hath been used
Ever to conquer, and to have his word
Of contradiction. Shakspeare.

He, methinks, is no great scholar,
Who can mistake desire for choler. Prior.

CHOLERA-MORBUS.* n. s. [Gr. χολή, bile, ἔμω, to flow; and the Lat. morbis, a disease.] In medicine, a sudden overflowing of the bile, or bilious matter, both upwards and downwards; a dangerous disease.

CHOLERICK. adj. [cholericus, Latin.]

1. Abounding with choler.

Our two great poets being so different in their tempers, the one choleric and sanguine, the other phlegmatick and melancholick. Dryden.

2. Angry; irascible: of persons.

Bull, in the main, was an honest plain-dealing fellow, choleric, bold, and of a very unconstant temper. Arbuthnot.

3. Angry; offensive: of words or actions.

There came in choleric haste towards me about seven or eight knights. Sidney.

CHOLERICKNESS. n. s. [from choleric.] Anger; irascibility; peevishness.

CHOLIA'MBICKS.* n. s. [Lat. choliambi, from χολός, lame.] Verses differing from the true Iambick, having an Iambick foot in the fifth place, and a spondee in the sixth, or last. They are the same as scanzons.

After him came one Babrius, that gave a new turn of the fables into choliambicks. Bentley, Diss. on Phalaris.

To CHOOSE.† v. a. I chose, I have chosen or chose. [choisir, Fr. ceopan, Sax. kiesen, Germ. kiesan, M. Goth. kesa, old Goth. Often written, in our old language, chese.]

1. To take by way of preference of several things offered; not to reject.

Did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest. 1 Sam. ii. 28.

I may neither choose whom I would, nor refuse whom I dislike. Shakspeare.

If he should offer to choose, and choose the right casket, you should refuse to perform your father's will, if you should refuse to accept him. Shakspeare.

2. To take; not to refuse.

Let us choose to us judgement; let us know among ourselves what is good. Job. xxxiv. 4.

The will has still so much freedom left as to enable it to choose any act in its kind good; as also to refuse any act in its kind evil. South, Sermon.

3. To select; to pick out of a number.

How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him? Job. ix. 14.

4. To elect for eternal happiness; to predestinate to life. A term of theologians.

To CHOOSE.† v. n. To have the power of choice between different things. It is generally joined with a negative, and signifies must necessarily be, Dr. Johnson says. This is indeed the modern construction; but, formerly, it was otherwise; as in the Book of Homilies, "who can choose but marvelle?" p. 280. The word thus occurs in a passive form, "as it cannot be chosen but we must needs fall often." Ib. p. 260.

Without the influence of the Deity supporting things, their utter annihilation could not choose but follow. Hooker.

Knave abroad,
Who having by their own importunate suit,
Convinced or supplied them, they cannot choose
But they must blab. Shakspeare.

When a favourite shall be raised upon the foundation of merit, then can he not choose but prosper. Hacon.

Thaw down a golden apple in her way;
For all her haste, she could not choose but stay. Dryden.

Those who are persuaded that they shall continue for ever, cannot choose but aspire after a happiness commensurate to their duration. Tillotson.

CHIO'SFR. n. s. [from choose.] He that has the power or office of choosing; elector.

Come all into this unit, quoth she;
Come closely in, be ruled by me;
Each one may here a choicer be,
For room you need not wrestle. Drayton.

In all things to deal with other men, as if I might be my own chooser. Hammond's Procl. Catechism.

This generality is not sufficient to make a good chooser, without a more particular contraction of his judgement. Wotton.

CHIO'SING.* n. s. [Sax. ceorung.] Choice; election. Wieland writes it chesyng.

To CHOP.† v. a. [kappen, Dut. couper, French.]

1. To cut with a quick blow.

What shall we do, if we perceive
Lord Hastings will not yield to our complots?
— Chop off his head, man. Shakspeare.

Within these three days his head is to be chopt off.

Shakspeare.

And where the cleaver chops the heifer's spoil,
Thy breathing nostril hold.

Gay, Trivia.

2. To devour eagerly: with up.

You are for making a hasty meal, and for chopping up your entertainment, like an hungry clown.

Dryden.

Upon the opening of his mouth he drops his breakfast, which the fox presently chopp'd up.

L'Estrange

3. To mince: to cut into small pieces.

They break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot.

Milch, iii. 3.

Some grannaries are made with clay, mixed with hair, chopped straw, mulch, and such like.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

By dividing of them into chapters and verses, they are so chopped and minced, and stand so broken and divided, that the common people take the verses usually for different aphorisms.

Locke.

4. To break into chips.

I remember the cow's dugs, that her pretty chopt hands had milked.

Shakspeare.

To CHOP. v. n.

1. To do any thing with a quick and unexpected motion, like that of a blow: as we say, the wind chops about, that is, changes suddenly.

If the body repurching be near, and yet not so near, as to make a concurrent echo, it choppeth with you upon the sudden.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. To catch with the mouth.

Out of greediness to get both, he chops at the shadow, and loses the substance.

L'Estrange.

3. To light or happen upon a thing suddenly: with upon.

To CHOP. † v. a. [ceapan, Sax. koopen, Dut. to buy, kaupan, Goth.]

1. To purchase generally by way of truck: to give one thing for another. "To chop and change, mercor."

The watry with the fiery rang'd.

Hudibras.

We go on chopping and changing our friends, as well as our horses.

L'Estrange.

3. To bandy; to altercate; to return one thing or word for another.

Let not the counsel at the bar chop with the judge, nor wind himself into the bandying of the cause a-new, after the judge hath declared his sentence.

Bacon.

To CHOP in. † To become modish; to come in.

He that cometh lately out of France will talk French English, and never blush at the matter. Another choppes in with English Italianated Wilson's Rhetorick, (1553.) B. iii.

To CHOP out. † To give vent to; to come out.

Who has brought

A merry tale about him, to raise a laughter

Amongst our wine? Why Strato, where art thou?

Thou wilt chop out with them unseasonably

When I desire them not.

Beaumont and Fl. Maud's Tragedy.

CHOP. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A piece chopped off. See CHIP.

Sir William Capel compounded for sixteen hundred pounds, yet Chop on would have cut another chop out of him, if the king had not died.

Bacon.

2. A small piece of meat, commonly of mutton.

Old Cross condemns all persons to be fops,

That can't regale themselves with mutton chope.

King's Cook.

3. A crack; or cleft.

Water will make wood to swell; as we see in the filling of the chops of bowls, by laying them in water.

Bacon.

Alas! how chop-fall'n now!

R. Blair, The Grave.

CHOP-HOUSE. n. s. [chop and house.] A mean house of entertainment, where provision ready dressed is sold.

I lost my place at the chop-house, where every man eats in publick a mess of broth, or chop of meat, in silence.

Spectator.

(CHOPIN). † n. s. [French.]

1. A French liquid measure, containing nearly a pint of Winchester.

My landlord, who is a pert smart man, brought up a choppin of white wine; and, for this particular, there are better French wines here than in England, and cheaper; for they are but a groat a quart.

Howell's Lett. i. vi. 38.

2. A term used in Scotland for a quart, of wine measure.

CHOPPER. † n. s. [from chop.] A butcher's cleaver; a word now used more frequently than cleaver.

CHOPPING. † n. s. [from chop.]

1. Act of merchandizing; "chopping and changing, mercatus."

Hudoc.

The chopping of bargains, when a man buys, not to hold, but to sell again, grindeth upon the seller and the buyer.

Bacon.

2. Altercation.

You'll never leave off your chopping of logick, 'till your skin is turned over your ears for prating.

L'Estrange.

CHOPPING. participial adj. [In this sense, of uncertain etymology.] An epithet frequently applied to infants, by way of ludicrous commendation: imagined by Skinner to signify lusty, from cap, Sax.; by others, to mean a child that would bring money at a market. Perhaps a greedy, hungry child, likely to live.

Both Jack Freeman and Ned Wild,

Would own the fair and chopping child.

Fenton.

CHOPPING-BLOCK. n. s. [chop and block.] A log of wood, on which any thing is laid to be cut in pieces.

Choral symphonies.

2. Singing in a choir.

And choral seraphs sung the second day.

Amhurst.

CHO'RALLY.* adv. [from choral.] In the manner of a chorus.

When the words are attended to by the eye, there is a plaintive cast in the strain which makes the well-known anthem, "I call and cry," somewhat affecting; I think, however, a modern composer would judge ill if he chose to set the same words chorally.

Mason, Ch. M. p. 116.

CHORD. n. s. [chorda, Lat.] When it signifies a rope or string in general, it is written cord: when its primitive signification is preserved, the h is retained.

1. The string of a musical instrument.

Who mov'd

Their stops and chords, was seen; his volant touch
Instinct thro' all proportions, low and high,
Fled and pursu'd transverse the resonant fuge.

Milton, P. L.

2. [In geometry.] A right line, which joins the two ends of any arch of a circle.

To CHORD. v. a. [from the noun.] To furnish with strings or chords: to string.

What passion cannot music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around.

Dryden.

Nurcia, situated in Umbria, which our modern chorographers call Spoleto.

Twissden, p. 5.

CHOROGRAP'HICAL.† adj. [See CHOROGRAPHER.]

Descriptive of particular regions or countries; laying down the boundaries of countries.

I have added a chorographical description of this terrestrial paradise.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Methinks it would well please any man to look upon — chorographical, topographical delineations; to behold, as it were, all the remote provinces, towns, cities of the world.

Barton, Ant. of Mel. p. 276.

The muse, yet observing her begun course of chorographical longitude, traces eastward the southern shore of the isle.

Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 2.

CHOROGRAP'HICALLY.† adv. [from chorographical.]

In a chorographical manner; according to the rule of chorography; in a manner descriptive of particular regions.

I may perhaps be found fault withal, because I do not chorographically place the funeral monuments in this my book.

Waver, Funeral Monum.

CHOROGRAPHY.† n. s. [See CHOROGRAPHER.] The art or practice of describing particular regions, or laying down the limits and boundaries of particular provinces. It is less in its object than geography, and greater than topography.

For most of what I use of chorography, join with me in thanks to that most learned source of antiquity, my instructing friend, Mr. Camden.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

This I have described to your lordship, because I think there might be good use made of it for chorography; for, otherwise, to make friendships by it were liberal.

Watson, Rem. p. 300.

We have some evidences of it in our first entrance into it, in this part of the chorography of Egypt.

Stillingft. Orig. Sac.

In delightful raptures we descry,

As in a map, Sion's chorography.

Bp. H. King on Sandys's Psalms.

CHO'RUS.† n. s. [chorus, Latin.]

1. A number of singers; a concert.

Parrus, commenting on the Revelation, divides the whole book as a tragedy, into acts distinguished each by a chorus of heavenly harpings and song between.

Milt. n. Introd. to Samson Agonistes.

The Grecian tragedy was at first nothing but a chorus of singers; afterwards one actor was introduced.

Dryden.

Never did a more full and unspotted chorus of human creatures join together in a hymn of devotion.

Addison.

In praise so just let every voice be join'd,
And fill the general chorus of mankind!

Pope.

2. The persons who are supposed to behold what passes in the acts of a tragedy, and sing their sentiments between the acts.

For supply,

Admit me chorus to this history.

Shakspeare.

3. The song between the acts of a tragedy.

Sophocles, the genius of his age,
Increas'd the pomp and beauty of the stage,

Engag'd the chorus song in every part.

4. Verses of a song in which the company join the singer.

CHOSE. [the preter tense, and sometimes the participle passive, from To choose.]

Our sovereign hereabove the rest might stand,
And here he chose again to rule the land.

Dryden.

CHO'SEN. [the participle passive, from To choose.]

If king Lewis vouchsafe to furnish us
With some few bands of chosen soldiers,
I'll undertake to land them on our coast.

Shakspeare.

CHOUGH. n. s. [ceo, Sax. chouca, Fr.] A bird which frequents the rocks by the sea side, like a jackdaw, but bigger. Hammer.

In birds, kites and kestrels have a resemblance with hawks, crows with ravens, daws, and choughs. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To crows the like impartial grace affords,
And choughs and daws, and such republick birds. Dryden.

CHOULE. n. s. [commonly pronounced and written jowl.] The crop of a bird.

The choule or crop, adhering unto the lower side of the bill, and so descending by the throat, is a bag or sachel.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CHOUSE. † v. a. [The original of this word is much doubted by Skinner, who tries to deduce it from the French gossier, to laugh at; or joncher, to wheedle; and from the Teutonic kosen, to prattle. It is perhaps a fortuitous and cant word, without etymology, Dr. Johnson says. Skinner might have given the old Fr. joucher, as well as joncher, which signifies to cog, that is, to cheat. V. Cotgrave in JOUCHER. But Serenius and Iire consider the Goth. kinsa, to fascinate, as the original of this word; and connect it with the verb cozen, to trick or cheat. It was formerly written chiause or chiauze; which countenances Henshaw's opinion, that the word is Turkish. Coles gives to chouse for cozen or deceive, and notices the similarity of sound with the Turkish chiaur.] See CHOUSE.

1. To cheat; to trick; to impose upon.

Long practisers in the art, who make themselves sport at others' follies and their own delusions: but our barber on the place is chiaur'd, a very pigeon, a younger brother.

Gayton, Notes on D. Quæ. iv. 18.

Freedom and zeal have chous'd you o'er and o'er;
Pray give us leave to bubble you once more. Dryden.

Our islanders however they may pretend to chouse one another, they make but very awkward rogues. Tatler, No. 213.

From London they came, silly people to chouse,
Their lands and their faces unknown. Swift.

2. It has of before the thing taken away by fraud.

When geese and pullen are seduc'd,
And sows of sucking pigs are chous'd. Hudibras.

CHOUSE. † n. s. [from the verb. This word is derived by Henshaw from kiaus, or chiaus, a messenger of the Turkish court; who, says he, is little better than a fool. Dr. Johnson might have added, that the Turkish chiaus or chiaous is a title of various character. The alai chiaous is a buffoon, who carries a baton tipped with silver, and plays a thousand monkey-tricks, fitter for the entertainment of children than of sensible men. Drummond's Travels, p. 151.]

1. A bubble; a tool; a man fit to be cheated.

A sottish chouse,
Who, when a thief has robb'd his house,
Applies himself to cunning men. Hudibras.

2. A trick or sham.

To CHO'WTER. v. n. To grumble or mutter like a froward child. Phillips.

CHRISM. † n. s. [χρίσμα, an ointment.] Unguent; or unction: it is only applied to sacred ceremonies.

One act never to be repeated, is not the thing that Christ's eternal priesthood, denoted especially by his unction or chrism, refers to.

Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

O Lord, the God of our fathers, do thou bless this oil with power, energy, and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that it may be the chrism against all filthiness.

Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 166.

He solicited the favour of England, by sending Henry a sacred rose, perfumed with musk, and anointed with chrism.

Hume, Hist. of E. II. 8.

CHRISMAL.* adj. [from chrism.] Relating to chrism.

Having thus conjured and prayed, he falls upon singing the praises of this chrismal oil.

Brevint, Saul and Sam. at Endor, p. 316.

CHRISMATORY.* n. s. [old Fr., chrismatoire.] A little vessel for the oil intended for chrism; and generally, a cruet or vessel.

Censers, chrismatories, corporasses, and chalices, which for thy whorish holiness might not sometime be touched, but will for thy sake be abhorred of all men.

Bale on the Revel. P. II. Bb. viii.

The word is sometimes translated lenticula, a chrismatory, or cruet, or vessel to contain oil; sometimes orbis, a spherical body encompassing others.

Smith's Old Age, p. 215.

CHRISM. † n. s. [See CHRISM.]

1. A child that dies within a month after its birth. So called from the chrism-cloth, a cloth anointed with holy unguent, which the children anciently wore till they were christened.

When the convulsion were but few, the number of chrisms and infants was greater.

Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

2. The cloth itself; with which also women used to shroud the child, if dying within the month.

The godfathers and godmothers shall take and lay their hands upon the child, and the minister shall put upon him his white vesture, commonly called the chrism.

Order of Baptism in K. Edw. VI. time.

As undiscerned as are the phantasms that make a chrism child to smile.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, i. §. 3.

CHRIST-CROSS-ROW.* n. s. An old term for the alphabet, probably from the cross usually set before it. It is corruptly written, as it is pronounced, chriss-cross-row. Dr. Ash so prints it; and Mr. Mason, criss-cross-row, who absurdly also calls it a cant word.

The cross of Christ, in its second and metaphorical acceptation, is the Christian's burden and badge; that which he is to take up, that which he is to glory in. The one is a paradox, and a smart one, to the flesh; the other to the world; but both, truths to be learnt before ever a letter in the Christian's Christ-cross-row; as being indeed, though none of the letters, as instructive as all the four and twenty.

Whitlock Mann, of the Eng. p. 527.

To CHRISTEN. † adj. [chriſtman, Sax. chrestienner, old Fr.]

1. To baptize; to initiate into christianity by water.

The minister of the parish, where the child was born or christened, shall examine whether the child be lawfully baptized or no.

Private Baptism, Com. Pr. Rubrick.

I am most certain this is the first example in England, since it was first christened.

Bp. Taylor, Discourse on Prayer.

2. To name; to denominate.

Where such evils as these reign, christen the thing what you will, it can be no better than a mock millenium.

Burnet.

Ere yet the morning shall new christen day.

For. P's Love's Sacrifice.

CHRISTENDOM. n. s. [from Christ and dom.] The collective body of christianity; the regions of which the inhabitants profess the christian religion.

What hath been done, the parts of Christendom most afflicted can best testify.

Hooker.

An older and a better soldier, none.

That Christendom gives out.

Shakspeare.

His computation is universally received over all Christendom.

Holder on Time.

CHRISTENING. n. s. [from the verb.] The ceremony of the first initiation into christianity.

The queen was with great solemnity crowned at Westminster, about two years after the marriage; like an old christening, that had staid long for godfathers. Bacon.

We shall insert the causes, why the account of christenings hath been neglected more than that of burials. Graunt.

The day of the christening being come, the house was filled with gossipa. Arbutnot and Pope.

CHRISTENING.* adj. [from the subst.] Relating to the christening.

My thoughts no christening dinners' crost,
No children cry'd for butter'd toast.

T. Warton, Progr. of Discontent.

CHRISTIAN.† n. s. [Christianus, Lat. clupren, Sax. old Fr. christian, christien.] A professor of the religion of Christ.

The disciples were called christians first in Antioch.

Acts, xi. 26.

We christians have certainly the best and the holiest, the wisest and most reasonable religion in the world. Tillotson.

CHRISTIAN.† adj. Professing the religion of Christ.

I'll not be made a soft and dull-ey'd fool,

To shake the head, relent, and sigh, and yield

To christian intercessors.

Shakspeare.

2. Ecclesiastical.

In briefly recounting the various species of ecclesiastical courts, or, as they are often styled, courts Christian, I shall begin with the lowest. Blackstone.

To CHRISTIAN. v. a. The same as To CHRISTEN, which see.

You allege the practice of all churches christianed to the contrary. Falke against Allen, (1586,) p. 252.

CHRISTIAN-NAME. n. s. The name given at the font, distinct from the gentilitious name, or surname.

CHRISTIANISM.† n. s. [old Fr. christianism, from christianismus, Lat.]

1. The christian religion.

That I may not seem, rather forcibly, to break out here out of Platonism into Christianism. More, Song of the Soul, Pref.
Herein the worst of kings, professing christianism, have by far exceeded him. Milton, Eiconoclast, ch. 1.

To believe antichristianity christianism, and christianity anti-christian.

Chillingworth, Pref. to the Auth. of Charity Maintained.

2. The nations professing christianity.

CHRISTIANITY. n. s. [chrétienté, French.] The religion of christians.

God doth will that couples, which are married, both infidels, if either party be converted into christianity, this should not make separation. Hooker.

Every one, who lives in the habitual practice of any voluntary sin, cuts himself off from christianity. Addison.

To CHRISTIANIZE.† v. a. [old Fr. christianizer.] To make christian; to convert to christianity.

Good dispositions and natural graces, more ready to be advanced by impressions from above, and christianized unto pieties. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 12.

Till this excellent piece of philosophy be, as Clemeus saith of the Pagan school, παινημένη διὰ Χριστοῦ, baptized by that Baptist, christianized by the addition of repentance.

Hammond, Serm. iv.

To christianize them, [the Psalms,] as Dr. Watts has done, would, I presume, deviate too far from the present practice of our establishment. Mason on Church Music, p. 194.

The principles of platonick philosophy, as it is now christianized. Dryden.

CHRISTIANLIKE.* adj. [from christian and like.]

Befitting a Christian.

Although the duke was enemy to him,
Yet he, most christianlike, laments his death.

Shakspeare, Henry VI. P. II.

In the managing of quarrels you may say he is wise; for either he avoids them with great discretion, or undertakes them with a most christianlike fear. Shakspeare, Much Ado, &c.

CHRISTIANLY.* adj. [from christian.] Becoming a Christian.

To inbreed in us this generous and christianly reverence one of another. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. 2.

CHRISTIANLY.† adv. [from christian.] Like a christian; as becomes one who professes the holy religion of Christ.

That they may see their children christianly and virtuously brought up. Office of Matrimony.

Those deep and retired thoughts, which, with every man christianly instructed, ought to be most frequent of God, and of his miraculous ways and works amongst men.

Milton, of Reform. in Eng. b. 1.

CHRISTIANNESS.* n. s. [from christian.] The profession of christianity.

It is very irregular and unreasonable to measure any action by a rule that belongs not to it, to try the exactness of the circle by the square, which should be done by the compass; and in like manner to judge the christianness of an action by the law of natural reason, which can only be judged by its conformity with the law of Christ, superior to that of nature.

Hammond, of Conscience, § 26.

CHRISTIANOGRAPHY.* n. s. [from christianus and γράφω, to describe.] A general description of the nations professing christianity.

In my christianography you may see divers liturgies.

Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 64.

CHRISTMAS.† n. s. [from Christ and mass.]

1. The day on which the nativity of our blessed Saviour is celebrated, by the particular service of the church.

Canons were made by several councils to oblige men to receive the Holy Communion three times a year at least, viz. at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide.

Whalley on the Comm. Prayer.

2. The season of Christmas; the festivity relating to it; the twelve days succeeding Christmas day.

Here was a consent,

(Knowing aforehand of our merriment)

To dash it like a christmas comedy. Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

Is not a commonly a Christmas gambol, or a tumbling trick?

Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

At Christmas I no more desire a rose,
Than wish a snow in May's new-fangled shows;
But like of each thing, that in season grows.

Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

The festivity of Christmas was observed much after the same manner, ceremonies, and solemnities, as in Italy.

Brown, Travels, (1685,) p. 151.

CHRISTMAS-BOX. n. s. [from christmas and box.] A box in which little presents are collected at Christmas.

• When time comes round, a Christmas-box they bear,
And one day makes them rich for all the year. Gay's Trivia.

CHRISTMAS-FLOWER. n. s. Hellebore.

CHRIST'S-THORN.† n. s. [So called, as Skinner fancies, because the thorns have some likeness to a cross.] A plant.

It hath long sharp spines: the flower has five leaves, in form of a rose: out of the flower-cup, which is divided into several segments, rises the pointal, which becomes a fruit, shaped like a bonnet, having a shell almost globular, which is divided into three cells, in each of which is contained a roundish seed. This is by many persons supposed to be the plant from which our Saviour's crown of thorns was composed. Miller.

The plains, in the finest cultivation, are divided by hedges of aloe, christthorn, or wild pomegranate.

Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, Lett. 1.

CHROMATICK. † adj. [χρῶμα, colour.]

1. Relating to colour.

I am now come to the third part of painting, which is called the chromatick, or colouring. Dryden, Dufrenoy.

2. Relating to a certain species of ancient musick, now unknown.

It was observed he never touched his lyre in such a truly chromatick and enharmonick manner. Arbuthnot and Pope.

3. Relating to a particular style in musick moving by semitones or half notes.

Those harsh chromatick jars
Of sin that all our musick mars.

Milton, Ode at a Sol. Musick, MS. Reading.

Musick is not designed to please only chromatick ears, but all that are capable of distinguishing harsh from disagreeable notes.

Addison, Spect. No. 29.

CHRONICAL. } adj. [old Fr. chronique, periodical;
CHRONICK. } from χρόνος, time.]

A chronical distemper is of length; as dropsies, asthmas, and the like. Quint.

Of diseases some are chronical, and of long duration; as, quartane agues, scurvy, wherein we defer the cure unto more advantageous seasons. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The lady's use of these excellencies is to divert the old man, when he is out of the pangs of a chronical distemper.

Spectator, No. 449.

CHRONICLE. n. s. [chronique, Fr. from χρόνος, time.]

1. A register or account of events in order of time.

No more yet of this;

For 'tis a chronicle of day by day,

Not a relation for a breakfast.

Shakspeare.

2. A history.

You lean too confidently on those Irish chronicles, which are most fabulous and forged. Spenser on Ireland.

If from the field I should return once more,

I and my sword will earn my chronicle.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

I'm traduc'd by tongues, which neither know

My faculties nor person, yet will be

The chronicles of my doing.

Shakspeare.

I give up to historians the generals and heroes which crowd their annals, together with those which you are to produce for the British chronicle.

Dryden.

To CHRONICLE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To record in chronicle, or history.

This to rehearse, should rather be to chronicle times than to search into reformation of abuses in that realm.

Spenser on Ireland.

2. To register; to record.

For now the devil, that told me I did well,

Says that this deed is chronicled in hell.

Shakspeare.

Love is your master; for he masters you:

And he that is so yoked by a fool,

Methinks, should not be chronicled for wise.

Shakspeare.

I shall be the jest of the town; nay, in two days I expect to be chronicled in ditty, and sung in woeful ballad.

Cong.

CHRONICLER. n. s. [from chronicle.]

1. A writer of chronicles; a recorder of events in order of time.

Here gathering chroniclers, and by them stand

Giddy fantastick poets of each land.

Donne.

2. A historian; one that keeps up the memory of things past.

I do herein rely upon these bards, or Irish chroniclers.

Spenser.

This custom was held by the Druids and bards of our ancient Britons, and of latter times by the Irish chroniclers, called rimmers.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

CHRONIQUE. * n. s. [Fr.] A chronicle.

The best chronique that can be now compiled of their late changes, must for the most part be collected from some aged grandsire's memory; a frail foundation to support an historical credit.

L. Addison, West Barbary, p. 74.

CHRONOGRAM. † n. s. [χρόνος, time, and γράφω, to write.] An inscription including the date of any action. Of this kind the following is an example.

Gloria lausque Deo, sæcLorVM in sæcLla sunt.

A chronogrammatical verse, which includes not only this year 1660, but numerical letters enough to reach above a thousand years further, until the year 2867.

Howell.

The Spaniards took it [Breda] again; as by inscriptions and chronograms are to be seen in divers places.

Brown, Travels, (1685,) p. 105.

CHRONOGRAMMATICAL. adj. [from chronogram.] Belonging to a chronogram. See the example from Howell in chronogram.

CHRONOGRAMMATIST. n. s. [from chronogram.] A writer of chronograms.

There are foreign universities, where, as you praise a man in England for being an excellent philosopher or poet, it is an ordinary character to be a great chronogrammatist.

Addison on Medals.

CHRONOGRAPHER. * n. s. [χρόνος, time, and γράφω, to describe.] He that describes circumstance of past times; a chronologist.

The common printed chronicle — is indeed but an epitome, or defloration, made by Robert of Lorraine, and the numerous rest of our monkish and succeeding chronographers.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

The author had before related, out of Pausanias the chronographer, that Sosibius an Antiochian had left, as a legacy to the city of Antioch, the yearly revenue of fifteen talents of gold.

Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 106.

CHRONOGRAPHY. * n. s. [Fr. chronographic, from the Gr. See CHRONOGRAPHER.] The description of past time; the arrangement of historical events.

CHRONOLOGER. † n. s. [χρόνος, time, and λόγος, doctrine.] He that studies or explains the science of computing past time, or of ranging past events according to their proper years.

Chronologers differ among themselves about most great epochs.

Holder on Time.

Among the Arabians there hath as yet come to my hands one only chronologer of these times. Gregory's Posthuma, p. 8.

This publication, [his chronology,] bearing the name of the immortal Newton, though highly built upon by subsequent chronologers, is so unspeakably inferior to that great man's other works, that I am almost unwilling to believe its authenticity; and can hardly be persuaded he ever would have published it himself. Richardson on the Languages, &c. of the East, i. 1.

CHRONOLOGICAL. adj. [from chronology.] Relating to the doctrine of time.

Thus much touching the chronological account of some times and things past, without confining myself to the exactness of years.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

CHRONOLOGICALLY. † adv. [from chronological.] In a chronological manner; according to the laws or rules of chronology; according to the exact series of time.

Follow them politically, chronologically, and geographically.

Lt. Chesterfield.

CHRONOLOGICK. * adj. [from chronology.] Denoting periods of time.

May chronologick spouts

Retain no cypher legible! T. Warton, Epist. from T. Hearne.

The chronologick classing of those histories which my most sanguine wishes went to.

Pownall on Antiquities, p. 127.

CHRONOLOGIST. n. s. [See CHRONOLOGER.] One that studies or explains time; one that ranges past events according to the order of time; a chronologer.

According to these chronologists, the prophecy of the Rabin that the world should last but six thousand years, has been long disproved.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

All that learned noise and dust of the chronologist is wholly to be avoided. Locke on Education.

CHRONOLOGY. n. s. [χρόνος, time, and λόγος, doctrine.] The science of computing and adjusting the periods of time; as the revolution of the sun and moon; and of computing time past, and referring each event to the proper year.

And the measure of the year not being so perfectly known to the ancients, rendered it very difficult for them to transmit a true chronology to succeeding ages. Holder on Time.

Where I allude to the custom of the Greeks, I believe I may be justified by the strictest chronology; though a poet is not obliged to the rules that confine an historian. Prior.

CHRONOMETER. n. s. [χρόνος and μέτρον.] An instrument for the exact measurement of time.

According to observation made with a pendulum chronometer, a bullet, at its first discharge, flies five hundred and ten yards in five half seconds. Derham.

CHRY'SALIS. n. s. [from χρῆς, gold, because of the golden colour in the nymphæ of some insects.] A term used by some naturalists for aurelia, or the first apparent change of the maggot of any species of insects. Chambers.

CHRY'SOLITE. n. s. [χρῆς, gold, and λίθος, a stone.] A precious stone of a dusky green, with a cast of yellow. Woodward.

Such another world,
Of one nature and perfect chrysolite,
I'd not have sold her for. Shakspeare.

If metal, part seem'd gold, part silver clear:
If stone, carbuncle most, or chrysolite. Milton, P. L.

CHRYSO'PRASUS. n. s. [χρῆς, gold, and πράσινος, green.] A precious stone of a yellow colour, approaching to green.

The ninth a topaz, the tenth a chrysoprasus. Rev. xxi. 20.

CHUB. n. s. [from cop, a great head, Skinner.] A river fish. The chevin.

The chub is in prime from Midmay to Candlemas, but best in winter. He is full of small bones: he eats waterish; not firm, but limp and tasteless: nevertheless, he may be so dressed as to make him very good meat. Walton, Angler.

CHUBBED. adj. [from chub.] Big-headed like a chub.

CHUBBY.* } adj. [from chub.] We still use the CHUBFACED. } expression, "a chubby boy," for one having a large or fat face.

I never saw a fool lean; the chub-faced fop
Shines sleek with full-cream'd fat of happiness. Marston, Antonio's Revenge.

To CHUCK. v. n. [A word probably formed in imitation of the sound that it expresses; or perhaps corrupted from chick.] To make a noise like a hen, when she calls her chickens.

To CHUCK.† v. a.

1. To call as a hen calls her young.
Then crowing, clapp'd his wings, th' appointed call,
To chuck his wives together in the hall. Dryden, Fables.

2. To give a gentle blow under the chin, so as to make the mouth strike together. [This is probably from chock, a blow. See CHOCK, and the subst. CHUCK.]

Come, chuck the infant under the chin, force a smile, and cry, Ah, the boy takes after his mother's relations. Congreve.

To CHUCK.* v. n. [Ital. scuccherare; Dutch, scachen.] To jeer; to laugh. The parent of our better known word, chuckle.

But, bold-fac'd Satyr, strain not over high,
But laugh and chuck at meaner gullery. Marston, Sat. ii.

To CHUCK.* v. a. To throw, by a quick and dexterous motion, any heavy weight, so that it shall nicely fall in a given place. So carmen and waggoners say, "chuck that sack or parcel down here."

This use of the verb seems to be taken from chuck-farthing.

CHUCK.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The voice of a hen.

He made the chuck four or five times, that people use to make to chickens when they call them. Temple.

2. A word of endearment, corrupted from chicken or chick.

Come, your promise. — What promise, chuck? Shakspeare.

3. A sudden small noise.

4. A little blow under the chin; written "chock under the chin," in Sherwood's old dictionary. See To CHUCK, in this sense; and also CHOCK.

CHUCK-FARTHING. n. s. [chuck and farthing.] A play, at which the money falls with a chuck into the hole beneath.

He lost his money at chuck-farthing, shuffle-cap, and all fours. Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

To CHUCKLE.† v. n. [Ital. scuccherare, Dutch schachen.] To laugh vehemently; to laugh convulsively.

What tale shall I to my old father tell?
'Twill make him chuckle thou'rt bestow'd so well. Dryden.

She to intrigues was e'en hard hearted;
She chuck'd when a bawd was carted. Prior.

To CHUCKLE. v. a. [from chuck.]

1. To call as a hen.

I am not far from the women's apartment, I am sure; and if these birds are within distance, here's that will chuckle 'em together. Dryden.

2. To cocker; to fondle.

Your confessor, that parcel of holy guts and garbidge; he must chuckle you, and moan you. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

To CHUD.* [perhaps from To chere.] To chaup or bite.

When she rides, the horse chuds his bit so cheerfully, as if he wished his burthen might grow to his back.

Stafford's Noble dissolv'd into a Nilus, p. 119.

CHUET. n. s. [probably from To chere.] An old word, as it seems, for forced meat. See CHEWER.

As for chucks, which are likewise minced meat, instead of butter and fat, it were good to moisten them partly with cream, or almond or pistachio milk. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CHUFF.† n. s. [A word of uncertain derivation; perhaps corrupted from chub, or derived from kaf, Welsh, a stock, Dr. Johnson says. Dr. Jamieson considers the Scottish coof or cufe the same as our chuff; and thinks that the Su. Goth. kufia, to keep under, to insult, or the Iceland. kueif, one who is cowardly or feeble, may be akin to this word. I differ from this. Chuffi, in our old lexicography, is a countryman; rusticus, as in the Prompt. Parv. The Su. kuffe, from the old Goth. kofi, is a cottage. This seems to suggest in some degree, the etymology of chuff. The phrase says Mr. Steevens, of fat chuffs in Shakspeare, "is a term of contempt always applied to rich and avaricious people, and chuff is probably a corruption of chough, a thievish bird that collects his prey on the sea-shore." This will not be received; and "a rich chuff," and "a fat chuff," which are both mentioned in our old lexicography, are also interpreted "a good rich yeoman," as well as a "big or fat chuff." The old Fr. joffu must not be forgotten, which Cotgrave translates, "chuffie, fat-cheeked, or putt up in the face," which hitherto has been overlooked; and this meaning of bloated or fat may countenance the Teut. kuffe and the Sax. cýr, a barrel, as the original.] A coarse, fat-headed, blunt clown.

Hang ye, gorbellied knaves, are you undone? No, ye fat chuffs, I would your store were here. Shakspeare.

A less generous chuff than this in the fable, would have hugged his bags to the last. L'Estrange.

CHUFFILY. adv. [from chuffy.] Surlily; stomach-fully. John answered chuffily. Richardson, Charissa.

CHUFFINESS. n. s. [from chuffy.] Clownishness; surliness.

CHUFFY. † adj. [from chuff; old Fr. joffu. But see CHUFF.] Blunt; surly; fat.

The goddess drank; a chuffy lad was by,

Who saw the liquor with a grudging eye,

And grinning cries, she's greedily more than dry.

Manwaring, Ovid's Met. B. 5.

CHUM. n. s. [chom, Armorick, to live together.] A chamber fellow; a term used in the universities.

CHUMP. n. s. A thick heavy piece of wood, less than a block.

When one is battered, they can quickly, of a chump of wood, accommodate themselves with another. Morson.

CHURCH. † n. s. [Sax. cýrce, cýric: Germ. kirche; Gr. εκκλησία, from ἐκ, the Lord, and αἰα, house.]

1. The collective body of christians, usually termed the catholick church.

The church being a supernatural society, doth differ from natural societies in this; that the persons unto whom we associate ourselves in the one, are men, simply considered as men; but they to whom we be joined in the other, are God, angels, and holy men. Hooker.

2. The body of christians adhering to one particular opinion or form of worship.

The church is a religious assembly, or the large fair building where they meet; and sometimes the same word means a synod of bishops, or of presbyters; and in some places it is the pope and a general council. Watts, Logick.

3. The place which christians consecrate to the worship of God.

It comprehends the whole church, viz. the nave or body of the church, together with the chancel which is even included under the word church. Ayliffe, Parergon.

That churches were consecrated unto none but the Lord only, the very general name chiefly doth sufficiently shew: church doth signify no other thing than the Lord's house. Hooker.

Though you unty the winds, and let them fight Against the churches. Shakspeare.

4. Ecclesiastical authority or power, in contradistinction to the civil power of the state.

Lest I should grow tedious about small matters at a time when such great and weighty concerns are under consideration in church and state, I will come to a conclusion.

Sir G. Wheeler, Descript. of Anc. Churches, p. 128.

The same criminal may be absolved by the church, and condemned by the state; absolved or pardoned by the state, yet censured by the church. Leslie.

5. It is used frequently in conjunction with other words; as church-member, the member of a church; church-power, spiritual or ecclesiastical authority.

TO CHURCH. † v. a. [from the noun.] To perform with any one the office of returning thanks in the church, after any signal deliverance, as from the danger of childbirth.

It was the ancient usage of the church of England for women to come veiled, who came to be churched.

Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

CHURCH-ALE. † n. s. [from church and ale.] A wake, or feast, commemorative of the dedication of the church. See ALE.

For the church-ale, two young men of the parish are yearly chosen to be wardens, who make collection among the parishioners of what provision it pleaseth them to bestow. Carew.

The church-war leens or quest-men, and their assistants, shall suffer no plays, feasts, banquets, suppers, church-ales, drinkings, temporal courts, or leets, lay-injuries, musters, or any other profane usage, to be kept in the church; chapel, or churchyard. Const. and Canons Ecclesiastical, § 88.

CHURCH-ATTIRE. n. s. The habit in which men officiate at divine service.

These and such like were their discourses, touching that church-attire, which with us for the most part is used in public prayer. Hooker.

CHURCH-AUTHORITY. n. s. Ecclesiastical power; spiritual jurisdiction.

In this point of church-authority, I have sifted all the little scraps alleged. Atterbury.

CHURCH-BENCH.  n. s.* The seat in the porch of a church.

Let us go sit here upon the church-bench till two, and then all to bed. Shakspeare, Much Ado, &c.

CHURCH-BURIAL. n. s. Burial according to the rites of the church.

The bishop has the care of seeing that all christians, after their deaths, be not denied church-burial according to the usage and custom of the place. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CHURCHING.  n. s.* [from To church.] The act of returning thanks in the church. See TO CHURCH.

The absurdity, which some would introduce, of stifling their acknowledgments in private houses, and in giving thanks for their recovery and enlargement in no other place than that of their confinement and restraint; is a practice inconsistent with the very name of the office, which is called the churching of women, and consequently implies a ridiculous solecism of being churched at home. Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

CHURCHIDOM.  n. s.* [from church and dom.] Establishment; government.

Whatsoever church pretendeth to a new beginning, pretendeth at the same time to a new churchdom; and whatsoever is so new, is none. So necessary it is to believe the holy catholick church. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 9.

CHURCH-FOUNDER. n. s. He that builds or endows a church.

Whether emperours or bishops in those days were church-founders, the solemn dedication of churches they thought not to be a work in itself either vain or superstitious. Hooker.

CHURCH-LAND.  n. s.* Land belonging to churches, religious houses, and benefices.

I shall not here enter into the religious account of church-lands. Sir H. Yelveston's Pref. to Bp. Morton's Episcopacy.

CHURCHLIKE.  adj.* [from church and like.] Becoming a churchman.

Nor shall proud Lancaster usurp my right,
Nor hold his scepter in his childish fist,
Nor wear the diadem upon his head,
Whose church-like humours fit not for a crown.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

CHURCHMAN. n. s. [from church and man.]

1. An ecclesiastick; a clergyman; one that ministers in sacred things.

If any thing be offered to you touching the church and churchmen, or church-government, rely not only upon yourself. Bacon.

A very difficult work to do, to reform and reduce a church into order, that had been so long neglected, and that was so ill filled by many weak and more wilful churchmen. Clarendon.

Patience in want, and poverty of mind,
These marks of church and churchmen he design'd,
And living taught, and dying left behind. Dryden, Fables.

2. An adherent to the church of England.

CHURCH-MUSICK.* n. s. The service of chant and anthem in churches and cathedrals.

It was anciently customary for men and women of the first quality, ecclesiasticks, and others, who were lovers of church-musick, to be admitted into this corporation, [of parish-clerks.]
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 396.

CHURCH-PREFERMENT.* n. s. Benefice in the church.

For any church-preferment thou hast a mind to.

B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

He possessed some church-preferments in the reign of Edward the sixth.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 240.

CHURCHSHIP.* n. s. Institution of the church.

The Jews were his own also by right of churchship, as selected and inclosed by God, from amidst all other nations, to be the seat of his worship, and the great conservatory of all the sacred oracles, and means of salvation.

South, Sermon on John, i. 11.

CHURCH-WARDENS. n. s. [See WARDEN?] Officers yearly chosen, by the consent of the minister and parishioners, according to the custom of each place, to look to the church, church-yard, and such things as belong to both; and to observe the behaviour of the parishioners, for such faults as appertain to the jurisdiction or censure of the ecclesiastical court. They are a kind of corporation, enabled by law to sue for any thing belonging to their church, or poor of their parish. Cowell.

There should likewise church-wardens, of the gravest men in the parish, be appointed, as they be here in England.

Spenser on Ireland.

Our church-wardens

Feast on the silver, and give us the farthings.

Gay.

CHURCHWAY.* n. s. The road that leads to the church.

Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite,
In the church-way paths to glide.

Shakespeare, Mids. Night's Dream.

CHURCHWORK.* n. s. An expression applied to work which is carried on slowly.

This siege was church-work; and therefore went on slowly.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 111.

Contrary to the proverb, church-work went on the most speedily.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 36.

CHURCHYARD. n. s. The ground adjoining to the church, in which the dead are buried; a cemetery.

I am almost afraid to stand alone

Here in the churchyard, yet I will adventure.

Shakespeare.

In churchyards, where they bury much, the earth will consume the corps in far shorter time than other earth will.

Bacon.

No place so sacred from such fops is barr'd;

Nor is Paul's church more safe than Paul's churchyard.

Pope.

CHURL.* n. s. [ceopl, Sax. carl, in German, is strong, rusticks being always observed to be strong bodied, Dr. Johnson says. This may apply to the first and second senses which he has given, but not to the third; which belongs to the Goth. karl, an old, and a poor, and mean, man. See also CARLE.]

1. A rustick; a countryman; a labourer.

He holdeth himself a gentleman, and scorneth to work or use any hard labour, which he saith is the life of a peasant or churl.

Spenser on Ireland.

One of the baser sort, which they call churls, being reproved for his oath, answered confidently, that his lord commanded him.

Spenser on Ireland.

Churl, upon thy eyes I throw

All the power this charm doth owe.

Shakespeare

From this light cause the infernal maid prepares

The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.

Dryden.

2. A rude, surly, ill-bred man.

A churl's courtesy rarely comes, but either for gain or falshood.

Sidney.

3. A miser; a niggard; a selfish or greedy wretch.

The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful.

Isaiah, xxxii. 5.

Poison, I see, hath been his timeless end!

O churl drink all, and leave no friendly drop

To help me after!

Shakespeare.

CHURLISH.* adj. [Sax. ceoplisc.]

1. Rude; brutal; harsh; austere; sour; merciless; unkind; uncivil.

A sea of melting pearl, which some call tears,

Those at her father's churlish feet she tender'd.

Shakespeare.

The interruption of their churlish drums

Cuts off more circumstance; they are at hand

To parly, or to fight.

Shakespeare.

A lion in love with a lass, desired her father's consent. The answer was churlish enough, He'd never marry his daughter to a brute.

L'Estrange.

He the pursuit of churlish beasts,

Prefer'd to sleeping on her breasts.

Waller.

2. Selfish; avaricious.

The man was churlish and evil in his doings.

I Sam. xxv. 3.

This sullen churlish thief

Had all his mind plac'd upon Mully's beef.

King.

3. [Of things.] Unpliant: cross-grained; unmanageable; harsh; not yielding.

If there be emission of spirit, the body of the metal will be hard and churlish.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The Cornish were become, like metal often fired and quenched, churlish, and that would sooner break than bow.

Bacon, Henry VII.

Iron, in a quick fire, relents and melts; but, take it out of the furnace, and it grows hard again, nay worse, churlish and unmalleable.

Abp. Sancroft's Sermon, p. 103.

In the hundreds of Essex they have a very churlish blue clay.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

4. Vexatious; obstructive.

Will you again unknit

This churlish knot of all abhorred war?

Shakespeare.

Spain found the war so churlish and longsome, as they found they should consume themselves in an endless war.

Bacon.

Spreads a path clear as the day,

Where no churlish rub says nay.

Crashaw.

CHURLISHLY.* adv. [from churlish.] Rudely; brutally.

A fool will upbraid churlishly.

Eccles. xviii. 18.

How churlishly I chid Lucetta hence,

When willingly I would have had her here!

Shakespeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

He was known to have borne himself churlishly and proudly towards Emma his sister

Milton, Hist. of Eng. b. 6.

After he had breathed out a thousand fruitless threats, he assaults the walls with violence; but by Rustan as churlishly answered, and with great loss compelled to retreat.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 88.

To the oak, now remnant, the olive did churlishly put over the son for a reward of the service of his sire.

Howell.

CHURLISHNESS.* n. s. [from churlish; cypliceneffe, Saxon.]

1. Brutality; ruggedness of manner.

Better is the churlishness of a man than a courteous woman.

Eccles. xlii. 14.

In the churlishness of fortune, a poor honest man suffers in this world.

L'Estrange.

2. Difficulty of management. See the third sense of CHURLISH.

I do find, Mr. Speaker, that when kingdoms and states are entered into terms and resolutions of hostility, one against the other, yet they are many times restrained from their attempts by four impediments. — The third, when they have conceived an apprehension of the difficulty, and churlishness of the enterprise, and that it is not prepared to their hand.

Bacon, Speech in Parl. 39. Eliz.

C H Y

CHURLY.* adj. [from churl.] Rude; boisterous; violent.

The ship, where Jonah sleeps,
Is vexed sore, and batter'd on the deeps,
And well nigh split upon the threatening rock,
With many a boisterous brush and churl knock.

Quarles, Feast for Worms, (1620.) § 2.

CHURME. n. s. [more properly chirm, from the Saxon cýrme, a clamour or noise; as to chirre is to coo as a turtle.] A confused sound; a noise.

He was conveyed to the Tower with the churme of a thousand taunts and reproaches. Bacon.

CHURN.† n. s. [properly chern, from kern, Dut. ciern, cepe, Sax. Goth. kerna, to churn. See QUERN. The Sax. cepe is considered a derivative of cýpan, to turn. All these words, however, may be referred to the Lat. gicus, or the Gr. γυρος.] The vessel in which the butter is, by long and violent agitation, coagulated and separated from the serous parts of the milk.

Her aukward fist did ne'er employ the churn.

Gay, Pastorals.

To CHURN.† v. a. [kernen, Dutch, cepan, Sax. kerna, Goth. Our elder authors write it cherne. And kern is yet a local word.]

1. To agitate or shake any thing by a violent motion. Dr. Johnson cites a passage from Shakspeare, in proof of this meaning; but he reads churning on for German one, the true reading. The passage had been sophisticated by Pope and Warburton, and Johnson preferred erring with them to the adoption of the old and genuine lection, as the alteration here furnished a fancied illustration of this verb.

Froth fills his chaps, he sends a grunting sound,
And part he churns, and part befoams the ground. Dryd. v.
Churn'd in his teeth, the foamy venom rose. Addison.

The mechanism of nature, in converting our aliment, consists in mixing with it animal juices, and, in the action of the solid parts, churning them together. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. To make butter by agitating the milk.

Skim milk: and sometimes labour in the quern;
And bootless make the breathless housewife churn.

Shakspeare, Midw. N. Dream.

Have you any churn'd milk, or new cheese.

Wadroepe's Fr. Gr. p. 211.

CHURNING.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of making butter.

The churning of milk bringeth forth butter. Prov. xxx. 33.

This is Mab, the mistress fairy,

That doth nightly rob the dairy,

And can hurt or help the churning,

As she please, without discerning. B. Jonson, Entertainments.

You may try the force of imagination, upon staying the coming of butter after the churning. Eucom, Nat. Hist.

I ne'er hurt their churnings.

Middleton's Watch, i. 2.

CHURNSTAFF.* n. s. [from churn and staff.] The instrument employed for churning. Sherwood.

CHURRWORM. n. s. [from cýrpan, Sax.] An insect that turns about nimbly; called also a fancricket.

Skinner. Philips.

To CHUSE. See To CHOOSE.

CHYLA'CEOUS. adj. [from chyle.] Belonging to chyle; consisting of chyle.

When the spirits of the chyle have half fermented the chylaceous mass, it has the state of drink, not ripened by fermentation. Floyer on the Humours.

CHYLE. n. s. [χύλος.] The white juice formed in the stomach by digestion of the aliment, and afterwards changed into blood.

This powerful ferment, mingling with the parts,
The ley'd mass to milky chyle converts. Blackmore.

C H Y

The chyle cannot pass through the smallest vessels.

Arbuthnot.

CHYLIFA'CTION. n. s. [from chyle.] The act or process of making chyle in the body.

Drinking excessively during the time of chylifaction, stops perspiration. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CHYLIFA'CTIVE. adj. [from chylus and facio, to make, Lat.] Having the power of making chyle.

CHYLOPŒ'TICK. adj. [χύλος, and ποιέω.] Having the power, or the office, of forming chyle.

According to the force of the chylopœtick organs, more or less chyle may be extracted from the same food. Arbuthnot.

CHY'LOUS. adj. [from chyle.] Consisting of chyle: partaking of chyle.

Milk is the chylous part of an animal, already prepared.

Arbuthnot.

CHY'MICAL. } adj. [Lat. chymicus.]
CHY'MICK. }

1. Made by chymistry.

I'm tir'd with waiting for this chymick gold,
Which fools us young, and beggars us when old. Dryden.

The medicines are ranged in boxes, according to their natures, whether chymical or Galenical preparations. Watts.

2. Relating to chymistry.

Metlinks already, from this chymick flame,
I see a city of more precious mold. Dryden.

With chymick art exalts the min'ral pow'rs,
And draws the aromatick souls of flowers. Pope.

CHY'MICK.† n. s. [old Fr. chymique, a chymist. Cotgrave.] A chymist. Obsolete. Dr. Johnson says. While in use, it seems to have been employed rather contemptuously.

Galen mentions in his time but three sects of physicians — we have now a fourth, that go under the name of chymicks, hermeticks, or Paracelsians. Hakewill on Providence, p. 244.

He is turned chymick, sirrah; it seems so by his talk. — Here's old turning; these chymicks, seeking to turn lead into gold, turn away all their own silver. Brewer, Tongue, iv. 1.

The ancients observing in that material a kind of metallical nature, seem to have resolved it into nobler use; an art now utterly lost, or perchance kept up by a few chymicks. Wotton.

CHY'MICALY.† adv. [from chymical.] In a chymical manner.

Burgavius — specifies a lump to be made of man's blood, lucerna vitæ et mortis index, so he terms it; which, chymically prepared 20 days, and afterward kept in a glass, shall shew all the accidents of his life. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 281.

I need no muse to give my passion vent,

He brews his tears that studies to lament.

Verse chymically weeps; that pious rain,

Distill'd with art, is but the sweat o' the brain.

Cleveland, Eleg. on Abp. Laud.

CHY'MIST. n. s. [See CHYMISTRY.] A professor of chymistry: a philosopher by fire.

The starving chymist, in his golden views Supremely blest. Pope, Essay on Man.

CHY'MISTICAL.* adj. [old Fr. chymistique.] Relating to chymistry.

Paracelsus, and his chymistical followers, as so many Promethci, will fetch fire from heaven, will cure all manner of diseases, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 377.

CHY'MISTRY.† n. s. [derived by some from χύμος, juice, or χύω, to melt; by others from an oriental word, kema, black. According to the supposed etymology, it is written with y or e. Some deduce it from the name of a person eminently skilled in the science; whose name, however, is written both Χύμης and Χίμης. Others consider Chémi, the Coptick name of Egypt, which was the cradle of this science, as the original. V. Morin, Dict. Etm. Fr. et Gr. "It is derived originally from chemia, and that word from Cham.—The Egyptians were deeply skilled in astronomy, and geometry; also in chymistry, and physick." Bryant, Anc. Myth. vol. iii. p. 299.]

An art whereby sensible bodies contained in vessels, or capable of being contained therein, are so changed, by means of certain instruments, and principally fire, that their several powers and virtues are thereby discovered, with a view to philosophy, or medicine. Boerhaave.

Operations of chymistry fall short of vital force: no chymist can make milk or blood of grass. Arbutnot on Aliments.

CIBARIOUS. adj. [cibarius, Lat. from cibus, food.] Relating to food; useful for food; edible.

CIBOL. n. s. [ciboule, Fr.] See CHIBBAL. A small sort of onion used in sallads. This word is common in the Scotch dialect; but the l is not pronounced.

Ciboules, or scallions, are a kind of degenerate onions.

CICATRICE, or CICATRIX. n. s. [cicatrix, Lat.]

1. The scar remaining after a wound.

2. A mark; an impression: so used by Shakspeare less properly.

Lean but upon a rush,
The cicatrice and capable impressure
Thy palm some moments keeps.

Shakspeare.

CICATRISANT. n. s. [from cicatrice.] An application that induces a cicatrice.

CICATRISIVE. adj. [from cicatrice.] Having the qualities proper to induce a cicatrice.

CICATRIZATION. n. s. [from cicatrice.]

1. The act of healing the wound.

A vein bursted, or corroded in the lungs, is looked upon to be for the most part incurable, because of the motion and coughing of the lungs, tearing the gap wider, and hindering the conglutination and cicatrization of the vein. Harvey.

2. The state of being healed, or skinned over.

The first stage of healing or the discharge of matter is called digestion; the second, or the filling up with flesh, incarnation; and the last or skimming over cicatrization. Sharp, Surgery.

To CICATRIZE. v. a. [from cicatrix.]

1. To apply such medicines to wounds, or ulcers, as heal and skin them over. Quincy.

The apothecary, or chirurgion, giveth, with a cruel bill, the lately cicatrized wound a new gash.

Moral State of England, (1670,) p. 54.

2. To heal and induce the skin over a sore.

We incarned, and in a few days cicatrized it with a smooth cicatrix. Wiceman on Tumors.

CICELY. n. s. [myrrhis.] A sort of herb.

CICERONE.* n. s. [Ital.] plur. cicroni. A word of modern introduction into our speech for a guide.

He had not proceeded many steps from the monument before he beckoned to our cicrone. Shenstque.

One of the greatest vexations a curious person experiences in travelling through Spain, is the scarcity, the non-existence, of tolerable ciceroni; those you meet with are generally cobblers, who throw a brown cloak over their ragged apparel, and conduct you to a church or two, where they cannot give you the least satisfactory information concerning antiquities or curiosities. Swimburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 37.

CICERO'NIANISM.* n. s. An imitation of the style of Cicero.

Dwelling too much on cicronianisms. Milton, Arcopagitica.

CICHORACEOUS. adj. [from cichorium, Lat.] Having the qualities of succory.

Diureticks evacuate the salt serum; as all acid diureticks, and the testaceous and bitter cichoraceous plants. Floyer.

CICH-PEASE. n. s. [cicer.] A plant.

To CICURATE. v. a. [cicuro, Lat.] To tame; to reclaim from wildness; to make tame and tractable.

Poisons may yet retain some portion of their natures; yet are so refracted, cicuated, and subdued, as not to make good their destructive malignities. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CICURATION. n. s. [from cicurate.] The act of taming or reclaiming from wildness.

This holds not only in domestick and manumete birds; for then it might be the effect of cicuration or institution; but in the wild. Ray on the Creation.

CID.* n. s. [Span.] A chief; a commander.

CYDER. † n. s. [cidre, Fr. sidre, Ital. sicera, Lat. σικέρα, שכר. Dr. Johnson might have added, that the word is supposed to be originally of Egypt, and denoting an inebriating liquor. In old Fr. cisere is used for ale. The Saxons had the word cibep.]

1. All kind of strong liquours, except wine. This sense is now wholly obsolete.

He schal not drinke wyn ne cydy. Wicliffe, St. Luke, i.

2. Liquour made of the juice of fruits pressed.

We had also drink, wholesome and good wine of the grape, a kind of cider made of a fruit of that country; a wonderful pleasing and refreshing drink. Bacon.

5. The juice of apples expressed and fermented. This is now the sense.

To the utmost bounds of this

Wide universe Silurian cider borne,

Shall please all tastes, and triumph o'er the vine. Philips.

CYDERIST. n. s. [from cider.] A maker of cider.

When the ciderists have taken care for the best fruit, and ordered them after the best manner they could, yet hath their cider generally proved pale, sharp, and ill tasted. Mortimer.

CYDERKIN. n. s. [from cider.]

A low word used for the liquor made of the muck or gross matter of apples, after the cider is pressed out, and a convenient quantity of boiled water added to it; the whole infusing for about forty-eight hours. Philip, World of Words.

Cyderkin is made for common drinking, and supplies the place of small beer. Mortimer.

CEILING. n. s. See CEILING.

CERGE. n. s. [French.] A candle carried in processions.

CILIARY. adj. [cilium, Lat.] Belonging to the eyelids.

The ciliary processes, or rather the ligaments, observed in the inside of the sclerotick tunicle of the eye, do serve instead of a muscle, by the contraction, to alter the figure of the eye.

Ray on the Creation.

GILICIOUS. adj. [from cilicium, hair-cloth, Lat.] Made of hair.

A garment of camel's hair: that is, made of some texture of that hair, a coarse garment, a gilicious or sackcloth habit, suitable to the austerity of his life. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CIMA'R. † See CHIMERE, and SIMAR.

CIMBRICK.* n. s. [Lat. Cimbricus.] The language of the Cimbri, people of Jutland and Holstein.

Nor have our old poets borrowed phrases and a multitude of words from the Cimbri only, but from the Franks too.

Wotton's View of Hucker's Thes. by Shelton, p. 17.

CIME'LMARCH. n. s. [from κειμελιαρχης.] The chief keeper of plate, vestments, and things of value belonging to a church; a church-warden. Dict.

CY'METER. n. s. [cimitarra, Span. and Portug. from chimeter, Turkish. Bluteau's Portuguese Dictionary.] A sort of sword used by the Turks; short; heavy; and recurvated, or bent backward. This word is sometimes erroneously spelt scimitar, and scymiter; as in the following examples.

By this scimitar,
That slew the sophy and a Persian prince,
That won three fields of sultan Solymán. Shakespeare.
Our armours now may rust, our idle scymiters
Hang by our sides for ornament, not use. Dryden.

CIMISS.* n. s. [Lat. cimex, pl. cimices.] A noisome little worm, which raiseth wheals where it biteth; if it be broken, it yieldeth a stinking smell; the bug. Bullockar.

CIMMERIAN.* adj. [from Cimmerii, people of Italy, living in a valley between hills, which the sun, it is pretended, never visited; or, who lived in caves.] Extremely dark.

Let cimmerian darkness be my only habitation. Shelley, Arcad. l. 3.

Hence, loathed melancholy,—
In dark cimmerium d'sart ever dwell. Milton, L'Al.

CINCTURE. n. s. [cinctura, Lat.]

1. Something worn round the body.
Now happy he, whose cloak and cincture
Hold out this tempest. Shakespeare.
Columbus found the American, so girt
With feather'd cincture, naked else, and wild. Milton, P. L.
He binds the sacred cincture round his breast. Pope.

2. An inclosure.
The court and prison being within the cincture of one wall. Bacon, Hen. VII.

3. [In architecture.] A ring or list at the top and bottom of the shaft of a column; separating the shaft at one end from the base, at the other from the capital. It is supposed to be in imitation of the girths or ferrils anciently used, to strengthen and preserve the primitive wood-columns. Chambers.

CINDER. n. s. [ceindie, Fr. from cineres, Latin.]

1. A mass ignited and quenched, without being reduced to ashes.

I should make very forges of my cheeks,
That would to cinders burn up modesty,
Did but I speak thy deeds! Shakespeare.

There is in smiths cinders, by some adhesion of iron, sometimes to be found a magnetical operation. Brown.
So snow on Aetna does unmelted lie,
Whose rolling flames and scatter'd cinders fly. Waller.

2. A hot coal that has ceased to flame.
If from adown the hopeful chops
The fat upon a cinder drops,
To stinking smoke it turns the flame. Swift.

CINDER-WENCH. } n. s. [cinder and woman.] A CINDER-WOMAN. } woman whose trade is to rake in heaps of ashes for cinders.

'Tis under so much nasty rubbish laid,
To find it out's the cinder-woman's trade. Essay on Satire.
She had above five hundred suits of fine cloaths, and yet went abroad like a cinder-wench. Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.
In the black form of cinder-wench she came,
When love, the hour, the place had banish'd shame. Guy.

CINERATION. n. s. [from cineres, Lat.] The reduction of any thing by fire to ashes. A term of chymistry.

CINEREOUS.* adj. [Lat. cinereus.] Of ash colour.

The hair is red at the tips, cinereous beneath. Pennant.

CINERITIOUS.* adj. [cinericus, Lat.] Having the form or state of ashes.

The nerves arise from the glands of the cineritious part of the brain, and are terminated in all parts of the body. Chayne.

C I N

Broken and burnt rocks, ruins of buildings, and cineritious earth. Delany, Rev. Exam. ii. 126.

CINERULENT. adj. [from cineres, Lat.] Full of ashes. Dict.

CINGLE. n. s. [from cingulum, Lat.] A girth for a horse. Dict.

CINNABAR.* n. s. [Fr. cinnabre, or cinabre; from the Gr. κιννάβαρι, Lat. cinnabaris. It is an Indian word, according to Pliny. V. Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. and Gr.] Cinnabar is native or factitious: the factitious cinnabar is called vermilion.

Cinnabar is the ore out of which quicksilver is drawn, and consists partly of a mercurial, and partly of a sulphureo-ochreous matter. Woodward's Met. Fossils.

The particles of mercury, uniting with the particles of sulphur, compose cinnabar. Newton, Opt.

CINNABAR of Antimony, is made of mercury, sulphur, and crude antimony.

CINNAMON.* n. s. [cinnamomum, Lat. through the Greek, from the Heb. kinnamon.] The fragrant bark of a low tree in the island of Ceylon. Its leaves resemble those of the olive, both as to substance and colour. The fruit resembles an acorn or olive, and has neither the smell nor taste of the bark. When boiled in water, it yields an oil, which, as it cools and hardens, becomes as firm and white as tallow; the smell of which is agreeable in candles. The cinnamon of the ancients was different from ours. Chambers.

Let Araby extol her happy coast,
Her cinnamon and sweet anionum boast. Dryden, Fables.

CINNAMON Water is made by distilling the bark, first infused in barley water, in spirit of wine or white wine. Chambers.

CINQUE.* n. s. [Fr.] A Five. It is used in games alone; but is often compounded with other words, Dr. Johnson says. Cinque, however, is not confined to games. It signifies simply a five.

These five cinques, or these 25 round spots, in arms do signify numbers, as some writers have observed.

Potter on the Number 666, (1647,) p. 176.

CINQUE-FOIL. n. s. [cinque feuille, Fr.] A kind of five-leaved clover.

CINQUE-PAVE. n. s. [cinque pas, Fr.] A kind of grave dance.

Wooring, wedding, and repenting is a Scotch jig, a measure, and a cinque pace. The first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding, manfully and modest, as a measure, full of state and gravity; and then comes repentance, and, with his bad legs, falls into the cinque pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave. Shakespeare.

CINQUE-PORTS.* n. s. [cinque ports, Fr.]

Those havens that lie towards France, and therefore have been thought by our kings to be such as ought most vigilantly to be observed against invasion. In which respect the places where they are have a special governour or keeper, called by his office Lord Warden of the cinque ports; and divers privileges granted to them, as a particular jurisdiction, their warden having the authority of an admiral among them, and sending out writs in his own name. The cinque ports are Dover, Sandwich, Rye, Hastings, Seaford, Winchelsea, Rummey, and Hith; some of which, as the number exceeds five, must either be added to the first institution by some later grant, or accounted as appendants to some of the rest. Cowel.

They, that bear
The cloth of state above her, are four barons
Of the cinque ports. Shakespeare.
Temptations come in by those cinque-ports, the senses.

Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1639,) p. 297.

CINQUE-SPOTTED. adj. Having five spots.

On her left breast

A mole, cinque spotted, like the crimson drops

I th' bottom of a cowslip.

Shakespeare.

C'ON. n. s. [signy or scion, Fr.]

1. A sprout; a shoot from a plant.

We have reason to cool our raging motions, our carnal stings, our unbitted lusts; whereof I take this that you call love, to be a sect or cion. Shakespeare.

The stately Caledonian oak, newly settled in his triumphant throne, begirt with cions of his own royal stem. Howell.

2. The shoot engrafted or inserted on a stock.

The cion over-ruleth the stock; and the stock is but passive, and giveth alimment, but no motion to the graft. Bacon.

CIPHER. † n. s. [chifre, Fr. zifra, Ital. cifra, low Lat. from an oriental root.]

1. An arithmetical character, by which some number is noted; a figure.

2. An arithmetical mark, which, standing for nothing itself, increases the value of the other figures.

The cipher of itself implies a privation of value; but when disposed with other characters on the left of it, in the common arithmetick, it serves to augment each of their values by ten; and in decimal arithmetick, to lessen the value of each figure to the right of it, in the same proportion. Chambers.

Mine were the very cipher of a function,
To find the faults, whose fine stands in record,
And let go by the actor.

Shakespeare.

If the people be somewhat in the election, you cannot make them nulls or ciphers in the privation or translation. Bacon.

As, in accounts, ciphers and figures pass for real sums, so names pass for things. South.

3. An intertexture of letters engraved usually on boxes or plate.

Troy flami'd in burnish'd gold; and o'er the throne,

Arms and the Man in golden ciphers shone.

Pope.

Some mingling stir the melted tar, and some

Deep on the new-shorn vagrant's heaving side,

To stamp the master's cipher, ready stand.

Thomson.

4. A character in general.

In succeeding times this wisdom began to be written in ciphers and characters, and letters bearing the form of creatures.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

5. A secret or occult manner of writing, or the key to it.

To brachygraphy may be added the writing by zifers, or notæ furtivæ, secret marks for the hiding of the writer's mind from others, save him to whom he writes it; as also the witty invention of dezifring or discovering the most difficult of those secret characters. Hakewill on Providence, p. 261.

This book, as long liv'd as the elements,
In cipher writ, or new-made idioms.

Donne.

He was pleased to command me to stay at London, to send and receive all his letters; and I was furnished with nine several ciphers, in order to it. Denham.

6. A species of juggling.

That body, wheresoever that it light,

May learned be by ciphers, or by magicke might.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. ii. 45.

With that he circles draws, and squares,

With ciphers, astral characters.

Then looks 'em o'er to understand 'em,

Although set down hab-nab at random.

Hudibras, ii. iii.

To CIPHER. v. n. [from the noun.] To practise arithmetick.

You have been bred to business; you can cipher: I wonder you never used your pen and ink.

Arbutnot.

To CIPHER. † v. a.

VOL. I.

1. To write in occult characters.

He frequented sermons, and penned notes: his notes he ciphered with Greek characters. Hayward.

2. To designate; to characterise.

The face of either cipher'd either's heart.

Shakespeare, Rape of Lucrece.

Some loathsome dash the herald will contrive
To cipher me, how fondly I did dote.

Shakespeare, Rape of Lucrece.

CIRC.* n. s. [Fr. cirque, Lat. circus. See CIRCUS.]

An amphitheatrical circle for sports.

Circs of the same sort are still to be seen in Cornwall, so famous at this day for the athletic art.

Marlton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. Diss. 1.

CIRCE'NSIAL, or CIRCE'NSIAN.* adj. [Lat. ludi circenses, from the circus, in which the sports were exhibited.] Relating to the exhibitions in the amphitheatres of the Romans.

If the Romans had well known this airy chase, they would have left or less regarded their circensian recreations.

Sir T. Brown's Tracts, p. 117.

The circensian plays may very well include the representations of sea-fights, and sports performed in the amphitheatres.

Kennet, Rom. Antiq. ii. v. 2.

To CIRCINATE. v. a. [circino, Lat.] To make a circle; to compass round, or turn round.

Bailey.

CIRCINA'TION. n. s. [circinatio, Lat.] An orbicular motion; a turning round; a measuring with the compasses.

Bailey.

CIRCLE. † n. s. [cipcol, cipcul, Sax. circulus, Lat.]

1. A line continued till it ends where it begun, having all its parts equidistant from a common center.

Any thing, that moves round about in a circle, in less time than our ideas are wont to succeed one another in our minds, is not perceived to move; but seems to be a perfect intire circle of that matter, or colour, and not a part of a circle in motion.

Locke.

By a circle I understand not here perfect geometrical circle, but an orbicular figure, whose length is equal to its breadth; and which as to sense may seem circular.

Newton, Opt.

Then a deeper still,

In circle following circle, gathers round

To close the face of things.

Thomson, Summer.

2. The space included in a circular line.

3. A round body; an orb.

It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth.

Isaiah, xi. 22.

4. Compass; inclosure.

A great magician,

Obscured in the circle of the forest.

Shakespeare.

5. An assembly surrounding the principal person.

To have a box where eunuchs sing,

And, foremost in the circle, eye a king.

Pope, Horace.

6. A company; an assembly.

I will call over to him the whole circle of beauties that are disposed among the boxes.

Addison.

Ever since that time, Lisander visits in every circle.

Tatler.

7. Any series ending as it begins, and perpetually repeated.

There be fruit trees in hot countries, which have blossoms and young fruit, and young fruit and ripe fruit, almost all the year, succeeding one another; but this circle of ripening cannot be but in succulent plants, and hot countries.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Thus in a circle runs the peasant's pain,

And the year rolls within itself again.

Dryden, Virg.

8. An inconclusive form of argument, in which the foregoing proposition is proved by the following, and the following proposition is inferred from the foregoing.

That heavy bodies descend by gravity; and again, that gravity is a quality whereby an heavy body descends, is an imprudent circle, and teacheth nothing.

Glanville, Scriprie.

That fallacy called a circle, is when one of the premises in a syllogism is questioned and opposed, and we intend to prove it by the conclusion. Watts, Logic.

9. Circumlocution; indirect form of words.

Has he given the lie
In circle or oblique, or semicircle,
Or direct parallel? You must challenge him.

Fletcher, Q. of Corinth.

10. CIRCLES of the German empire. Such provinces and principalities as have a right to be present at diets.

Trevour.

To CIRCLE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To move round any thing.

The lords that were appointed to circle the hill, had some days before planted themselves in places convenient. Bacon.

Another Cynthia her new journey runs,
And other planets circle other suns. Pope, Dunciad.

2. To inclose; to surround.

What stern ungentle hands
Have lopp'd and hew'd, and made thy body bare
Of her two branches, those sweet ornaments,
Whose circling shadows kings have sought to sleep in?
Shakspeare.

While these fond arms, thus circling you, may prove
More heavy chains than those of hopeless love. Prior.

Unseen, he glided thro' the joyous crowd,
With darkness circled, and an ambient cloud. Pope.

3. To CIRCLE in. To confine: to keep together.

We term those things dry which have a consistence within themselves, and which, to enjoy a determinate figure, do not require the stop or hindrance of another body to limit and circle them in. Digby on Bodies.

To CIRCLE. v. n. To move circularly; to end where it begins.

The well fraught bowl
Circles incessant; whilst the humble cell
With quavering laugh, and rural jests resounds. Philips.

Now the circling years disclose,
The day predestin'd to reward his woes. Pope, Odyssey.

CIRCLED. adj. [from circle.] Having the form of a circle; round.

The inconstant moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb. Shakspeare.

CIRCLE.  n. s.* [from circle.] "Scriptor cyclicus," Hor. Ar. Poet.] A mean poet; a circular poet.

See CIRCULAR.

Nor so begin, as did that circle late,
I sing a noble war, and Priam's fate. B. Jonson, Art of Poetry.

CIRCLE. † n. s. [from circle.] A circle; an orb: properly a little circle. Formerly, a wreath, ring, or circlet of wicker, to set under a dish, in order to guard the table. Shakspeare.

Certain ladies or countesses, with plain circlets of gold without flowers. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII. Order of Procession.

Then take repast, till Hesperus displayed
His golden circlet in the western shade. Pope, Odys.

CIRCLING. part. adj. [from To circle.] Having the form of a circle; circular; round.

Round he surveys, and well might, where he stood
So high above the circling canopy
Of night's extended shade. Milton, P. L.

CIRCLY.  adj.* [from circle.] In the form of a circle or compass. Huloet.

CIRCUIT. † n. s. [circuit, Fr. circuitus, Lat.]

1. The act of moving round any thing.

There are four moons also perpetually rolling round the planet Jupiter, and carried along with him in his periodical circuit round the sun. Watts on the Mind.

2. The space inclosed in a circle.

He led me up
A woody mountain, whose high top was plain
A circuit wide inclosed. Milton, P. L.

3. Space; extent; measured by travelling round.

He attributeth unto it smallness, in respect of circuit. Hooker.

The lake of Bolsena is reckoned one and twenty miles in circuit. Addison on Italy.

4. A ring; a diadem; that by which any thing is incircled.

And this fell tempest shall not cease to rage,
'Till the golden circuit on my head
Do calm the fury of this mad-brain'd flaw. Shakspeare.

5. The visitations of the judges for holding assises.

The circuits, in former times, went but round about the pale; as the circuit of the cynosura about the pole. Davies.

6. The tract of country visited by the judges.

Nobles, bishops, and judges, that have great dioceses, and jurisdictions, and circuits, must read much in God's Book; for they need much honey to feed the people under them with.

Bp. of Chichester, Sermon, before the Queen, 1576.
He went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpeth; and judged Israel in all those places.

1 Sam. vii. 16.

7. Long deduction of reason; circumlocution.

Thou hast used no circuit of words. Huloet.

Up into the watch tower get,
And see all things despoil'd of fallacies;
Thou shalt not peep thro' lattices of eyes,
Nor hear thro' labyrinths of ears, nor learn
By circuit or collections to discern. Donne.

CIRCUIT of action. [In law.] Is a longer course of proceeding to recover the thing sued for, than is needful. Cowel.

To CIRCUIT. v. n. [from the noun.] To move circularly.

Pining with equinoctial heat, unless
The cordial cup perpetual motion keep,
Quick circuiting. Philips.

To CIRCUIT.  v. a.* [from the noun.] To move round; to travel round.

He went from year to year in circuit to [in the margin, he circuited] Bethel, and Gilgal, &c. 1 Sam. vii. 16.

At length Geryon, having circuited the air like a falcon towering without prey, deposits his burthen and vanishes.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. iii. 246.

CIRCUITER. † n. s. [from circuit.] One that travels a circuit. Formerly written circuitier.

Whether the thieves condemned by any circuitier corrupted have done more villainies than their judge.

Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. (1654), p. 513.
Like your fellow circuitier the sun: you travel the round of the earth, and behold all the iniquities under the heavens.

Pope.

CIRCUITION. † n. s. [circuitio, Lat.]

1. The act of going round any thing.

Kimchi testifieth, that all words which come from the root כס signify encompassing or circuitio.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii.

2. Compass; maze of argument.

To apprehend by what degrees they lean to things in show, though not indeed repugnant one to another, requireth more sharpness of wit, more intricate circuitious of discourse, and depth of judgement, than common ability doth yield. Hooker.

CIRCUITOUS.  adj.* [from circuit.] Round about.

There is no way to make a connection between the original constituent and the representative, but by circuitous means.

Burke.

CIRCUITOUSLY.  adv.* [from circuitous.] In a circuitous manner.

CIRCULABLE.  adj.* [from circle.] That which may be circulated.

In misery and sorrow circular. Sandys, Job, p. 12.
From whence the innumerable race of things,
By circular successive order springs. Roscommon.

3. Vulgar; mean; circumforaneous.

Had Virgil been a circular poet, and closely adhered to history, how could the Romans have had Dido? Dennis.

4. Ending in itself, used of a paralogism, where the second proposition at once proves the first, and is proved by it.

One of Cartes's first principles of reasoning, after he had doubted of every thing, seems to be too circular, to safely build upon; for he is for proving the being of God from the truth of our faculties, and the truth of our faculties from the being of a God. Baker, Reflect. on Learning.

5. Perfect; complete. Not now used.

In this, sister,
Your wisdom is not circular. Massinger, Emp. of the East.

6. CIRCULAR Letter. A letter directed to several persons who have the same interest in some common affair; as in the convocation of assemblies. Modern affectation has changed this expression into the substantive; and we now hear of nothing but circulars from publick offices, and circulars from superintendants of a feast or club.

7. CIRCULAR Lines. Such strait lines as are divided from the divisions made in the arch of a circle; as the lines of sines, tangents, and secants, on the plain scale and sector.

8. CIRCULAR Sailing, is that performed on the arch of a great circle.

CIRCULARITY. n. s. [from circular.] A circular form.

The heavens have no diversity or difference, but a simplicity of parts, and equiformity in motion, continually succeeding each other; so that from what point soever we compute, the account will be common unto the whole circularity. Brown.

CIRCULARLY. adv. [from circular.]

1. In form of a circle.

The internal form of it consists of several regions, involving one another like orbs about the same centre, or of the several elements cast circularly about each other. Burnet.

2. With a circular motion.

Trade, which, like blood, should circularly flow, Stopp'd in their channels, found its freedom lost. Dryden.
Every body, moved circularly about any centre, recedes, or endeavours to recede, from that centre of its motion. Ray.

CIRCULARY.* adj. [circularis, Lat.] Ending in itself.

Which rule must serve for the better understanding of that, which Damascene hath, touching cross, and circulary speeches, wherein there are attributed to God such things as belong to manhood, and to man such as properly concern the duty of Christ Jesus. Hooker, Ecc. Pol. v. § 53.

To CIRCULATE. v. n. [from circulus.]

1. To move in a circle; to run round; to return to the place whence it departed in a constant course.

If our lives motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood, must circulate. Denham.
Nature is a perpetual motion; and the work of the universe circulates without any interval or repose. L'Estrange.

2. To be dispersed.

As the mints of calumny are perpetually at work, a great number of curious inventions issued out from time to time, grow current among the party, and circulate through the whole kingdom. Addison.

To CIRCULATE.† v. a.

1. To travel round.

May I not conclude for certain that this man hath been in the moon, where his head hath been intoxicated with circulating the earth.

Bp. H. Croft, Animadv. on Burnet's Theory, (1685,) Pref.

2. To put about.

In the civil wars, the money spent on both sides was circulated at home; no publick debts contracted. Swift.

CIRCULATION.† n. s. [old Fr. circulation.]

1. Motion in a circle; a course in which the motion tends to the point from which it began.

What more obvious, one would think, than the circulation of the blood, unknown till the last age? Burnet, Theory.

As much blood passeth through the lungs as through all the rest of the body: the circulation is quicker, and heat greater, and their texture extremely delicate. Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. A series in which the same order is always observed, and things always return to the same state.

As for the sins of peace, thou hast brought upon us the miseries of war; so for the sins of war, thou seest fit to deny us the blessing of peace, and to keep us in a circulation of miseries. K. Charles.

God, by the ordinary rule of nature, permits this continual circulation of human things. Swift on Modern Education.

3. A reciprocal interchange of meaning.

When the apostle saith of the Jews, that they crucified the Lord of glory; and when the son of man, being on earth, affirmeth that the son of man was in heaven at the same instant, there is in these two speeches that mutual circulation before-mentioned. Hooker.

4. Currency of a substitute for money.

It comes with something solid in aid of the credit of the paper circulation. Burke.

CIRCULATORIOUS.* adj. [Lat. circulatorius.] One that travels in a circuit; one that shows tricks from house to house and from town to town.

Jesus did never make use of such unaccountable methods or instruments, as magical enchanters, diviners, circulatorious jugglers, and such emissaries of the devil, or self seeking impostors are wont to use. Barrow, Sermon ii. 20.

CIRCULATORY. n. s. [from circulate.] A chymical vessel, in which that which rises from the vessel on the fire, is collected and cooled in another fixed upon it, and falls down again.CIRCULATORY. adj. [from circulate.] Circulatory Letters are the same with CIRCULAR Letters.CIRCULATORY.* adj. The same as circulatorious, in its low sense.

Borde's circulatory peregrinations, in the quality of a quack-doctor, might have furnished more ample materials for an English topography. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 76.

CIRCUMAMBIENCY. n. s. [from circumambient.] The act of encompassing.

Ice receiveth its figure according unto the surface it conercteth, or the circumambieny which conformeth it. Brown.

CIRCUMAMBIENT.† adj. [circum and ambio, Latin.] Surrounding; encompassing; enclosing.

Some impute it to the quality of the circumambient air that hangs over the place. Howell's Lett. i. i. 28.

The circumambient coldness towards the sides of the vessel, like the second region, cooling and condensing of it. Wilkins.

To CIRCUMAMBULATE.† v. n. [from circum and ambulo, Lat.] To walk round about. Dict.

Why should he circumambulate the vocabulary for another couplet, to talk in harsher diction about glades of turf?

Seward's Letters, i. 345.

CIRCUMCELLIGNES.* n. s. A set of illiterate savage peasants, and desperate ruffians, who adhered to the party of the Donatists, in the fourth century. V. Chambers. The word has passed into our language for an expression of contempt; for in Cockeram's old dictionary, "a circumcellion" is defined "a tavern-hunter."

To CIRCUMCISE. † v. a. [circumcido, Latin. And our own word was formerly circumcide. "A doubt arose, whether those which came to the faith of the Gentiles should be circumciled." Stapleton's Fort. of Faith, 1565, fol. 139. b.] To cut the prepuce or foreskin, according to the law given to the Jews.

They came to circumcise the child. St. Luke, i. 59.

This concising punishment of circumcisers became a penal law among the Visigoths. Milton, of Cir. Power in Ec. Cases.

Having gained a competent skill and experience, they set up for circumcisers. L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 61.

CIRCUMCISION. n. s. [from circumcise.] The rite or act of cutting off the foreskin.

They left a race behind

Like to themselves, distinguishable scarce

From Gentiles, but by circumcision vain. Milton, P. R.

CIRCUMCURSATION.* n. s. [from Lat. circum and cursor.] The act of running up and down.

The address of Felicissimus and Fortunatus to Pope Cornelius was but a factious circumcursion of desperate wretches.

Barrow, Serm. i. p. 252.

To CIRCUMDUCT. v. a. [circumduco, Lat.] To contravene; to nullify: a term of civil law.

Acts of judicature may be cancelled and circumducted by the will and direction of the judge; as also by the consent of the parties litigant, before the judge has pronounced and given sentence. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CIRCUMDUCTION. † n. s. [from circumduct.]

1. Nullification; cancellation.

The citation may be circumducted, though the defendant should not appear; and the defendant must be cited, as a circumduction requires. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. A leading about.

By long circumduction perhaps any truth may be derived from any other truth. Hooker.

But thou scorn'st to stay

Under one title: thou hast made thy way

And flight about the isle, well near, by this

In thy admired Periegesis,

Or universal circumduction

Of all that read thy Poly-Olbion.

B. Jonson, Epigrams.

CIRCUMFERENCE. n. s. [circumferentia, Latin.]

1. The periphery; the line including and surrounding any thing.

Extend thus far thy bounds,

This be thy just circumference, O world!

Milton, P. L.

Because the hero is the center of the main action, all the lines from the circumference tend to him alone. Dryden.

Fire, moved nimbly in the circumference of a circle, makes the whole circumference appear like a circle of fire. Newton.

2. The space inclosed in a circle.

So was his will

Pronounc'd among the gods, and by an oath,

That shook heav'n's whole circumference, confirm'd.

Milton, P. L.

He first inclos'd for lists a level ground,

The whole circumference a mile around.

Dryden, Fables.

3. The external part of an orbicular body.

The bubble, being looked on by the light of the clouds reflected from it, seemed red at its apparent circumference. If the clouds were viewed through it, the colour at its circumference would be blue. Newton, Opticks.

'Tis a good omen to begin a reign.

Dryden, Prolog. to Alb. and Albanus.

CITHERN.† n. s. [Sax. cýcepe; Dutch cyter; Su. zitra; Germ. cither; Lat. cithara.] Our word is more frequently written cittern; and has been also converted into gittern or guittern; whence the more modern word, guitar. A kind of harp; a musical instrument.

At what time the heathen had profaned it, even in that was it dedicated with songs and citherns, and harps and cymbals.

1 Mac. iv. 54.

The cythron, the pandore, and the theorbo strike.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 4.

CITICISM.* n. s. [from city.] The behaviour of a citizen.

Although no bred courtling, yet a most particular man, of goodly havings, — reformed and transformed from his original cityism. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

CITIED.* adj. [from city.] Belonging to a city; having the quality of a city.

Whereas the hermit leads a sweet retired life,
From villages replete with ragged and sweating clowns,
And from the loathsome airs of smoky citied towns.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 13.

Where citied hill to hill reflected blaze.

Thomson, Liberty, P. i.

CITIZEN. n. s. [civis, Lat. citoyen, French.]

1. A freeman of a city; not a foreigner; not a slave.

All inhabitants within these walls are not properly citizens, but only such as are called freemen.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

2. A townsman; a man of trade; not a gentleman.

When he speaks not like a citizen,

You find him like a soldier. Shakspeare.

3. An inhabitant; a dweller in any place.

Far from noisy Rome, secure, he lives;

And one more citizen to Sibyl gives. Dryden.

CITIZEN. adj. [This is only in Shakspeare.] Having the qualities of a citizen; as cowardice, meanness.

So sick I am not, yet I am not well;

But not so citizen a wanton as

To seem to die ere sick. Shakspeare.

CITIZENSHIP.* n. s. [from citizen.] The quality of a citizen; "the freedom of a city." Sherwood.

They taking it otherwise, and refusing the good through an implanted evil disposition, and always prone to mischief, have not only rejected the citizenship as dishonourable, but also abhor both openly and secretly, the few among them who are well affected to us. Bp. Wilson's Bible, 3 Maccab. iii. 16.

Our citizenship, as saith the apostle, is in heaven.

Bp. Horne, Occas. Sermon. p. 158.

CITRINATION.* n. s. [Lat. citrinatio. "Citrinatio nihil aliud est quam completa albedinis digestio," Arnoldus de Nov. Vill. Charpentier, Gloss.] An old chymical expression.

Our silver citrination

Our cementing and fermentation. Chaucer, Man. Yeom. Tale.

The urine of manne, being whityshe, sheweth imperfect digestion: but when he hath well rested and slept after the same, and the digestion perfected, the urine becometh citrine, or of a deep yellowe color: so is it in alchymys: which made Arnoldo call this citrination perfect digestion, or the color proving the philosopher's stone brought almoste to the height of perfection. Fr. Thynne, Animado, on Speghel's Chaucer.

CITRINE. adj. [citrinus, Lat.] Lemon coloured; of a dark yellow.

The butterfly, papilio major, has its wings painted with citrine and black, both in long streaks and spots. Grew.

By citrine urine of a thicker consistence, the saltness of phlegm is known. Floyer on the Humours.

CITRINE. n. s. [from citrinus, Lat.]

A species of crystal of an extremely pure, clear, and fine texture, generally free from flaws and blemishes. It is ever found in a long and slender column, irregularly hexangular, and terminated by an hexangular pyramid. It is from one to four or five inches in length. This stone is very plentiful in the West Indies. Our jewellers have learned to call it citrine; and cut stones for rings out of it, which are mistaken for topazes. Hill on Fossils.

CITRON-TREE. n. s. [from citrus, Lat.]

It hath broad stiff leaves, like those of the laurel. The flowers consist of many leaves, expanded like a rose. The pistil becomes an oblong, thick, fleshy fruit, very full of juice. Genoa is the great nursery for these trees. One sort, with a pointed fruit, is in so great esteem, that the single fruits are sold in Florence for two shillings each. Miller.

May the sun
With citron groves adorn a distant soil. Addison.

CITRON-WATER. n. s. Aqua vitæ, distilled with the rind of citrons.

Like citron-waters matrons cheeks inflame. Pope.

CITRUL. n. s. The same with pumpion, so named from its yellow colour.

CITY. n. s. [cité, Fr. civitas, Lat.]

1. A large collection of houses and inhabitants.

Men seek safety from number better united, and from walls and fortifications; the use whereof is to make the few a match for the many: this is the original of cities. Temple.

City, in a strict sense, means the houses inclosed within the walls: in a larger sense, it reaches to all the suburbs. Watts.

2. [In the English law.] A town corporate, that hath a bishop and a cathedral church. Coxwell.

3. The inhabitants of a certain city, as distinguished from other subjects.

What is the city but the people? —

- True, the people are the city. Shakspeare.

I do suspect I have done some offence,
That seems disgracious in the city's eye. Shakspeare.

CITY. adj.

1. Relating to the city.

His enforcement of the city wives. Shakspeare.

He I accuse,

The city ports by this hath enter'd. Shakspeare.

2. Resembling the manners of the citizens.

Make not a city feast of it, to let the meat cool ere we can agree upon the first cut. Shakspeare.

In thee no wanton ears, to win with words,
Nor lurking toys, which city life affords.

Lodge, Pleas. Hist. of Glaucus, &c. (1610.)

CIVET. n. s. [civette, Fr. zibetta, Arabick, signifying scent.] A perfume from the civet cat.

The civet, or civet cat, is a little animal not unlike our cat. It is a native of the Indies, Peru, Brasil, Guinæa. The perfume is formed like a kind of grease, in a bag under its tail, between the anus and pudendum. It is gathered from time to time, and abounds in proportion as the animal is fed. Dict. Trevant.

Civet is of a baser birth than tar; the very uncleanly flux of a cat. Shakspeare.

Some putrefactions and excrements do yield excellent odours; as civet and musk, and, as some think, ambergrease.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CIVICAL.* adj. [Lat civicus.] Belonging to civil honours.

Their honorary crowns, triumphal, ovary, civil, obsidional, had little of flowers in them. Sir T. Brown, Tracts, p. 91.

CIVIC. adj. [civicus, Lat.] Relating to civil honours or practices; not military.

With equal rays immortal Tully shone:

Behind, Rome's genius waits with civic crowns,
And the great father of his country owns.

Pope, Temp. of Fame.

CIVIL. adj. [civilis, Lat.]

1. Relating to the community; political; relating to the city or government.

God gave them laws of civil regimen, and would not permit their common weal to be governed by any other laws than his own. Hooker, iii. § 11.

Part such as appertain
To civil justice; part, religious rites

Of sacrifice.

Milton, P. L.

But there is another unity, which would be most advantageous to our country; and that is, your endeavour after a civil, a political union in the whole nation. Sprat.

2. Relating to any man as a member of a community. Break not your promise, unless it be unlawful or impossible; either out of your natural, or out of your civil power.

Bp. Taylor.

3. Not in anarchy; not wild; not without rule or government.

For rudest minds with harmony were caught,
And civil life was by the muses taught.

Roscommon.

4. Not foreign; intestine.

From a civil war, God of his mercy defend us, as that which is most desperate of all others. Bacon to Villiers.

5. Not ecclesiastical; as, the ecclesiastical courts are controlled by the civil.

Unto whom the chief government of all estates in this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all causes doth appertain. Articles of Religion, Art. 37.

6. Not natural; as, a person banished or outlawed is said to suffer civil, though not natural death.

In case any estate be granted to a man for his life generally, it may determine by his civil death; as, if he enter into a monastery, whereby he is dead in law. Blackstone.

7. Not military; as, the civil magistrate's authority is obstructed by war.

But let grave annals paint the warrior's fame;
Fair shine his arms in history enroll'd;

Whilst humbler lyres his civil worth proclaim. Shenstone.

8. Not criminal; as, this is a civil process, not a criminal prosecution.

Private wrongs are an infringement of the rights belonging to individuals, considered as individuals; and are thereupon frequently termed civil injuries. Blackstone.

9. Civilised; not barbarous.

England was very rude and barbarous; for it is but even the other day since England grew civil. Spenser on Ireland.

Ho! who's here?

If any thing that's civil, speak. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Kent, in the commentaries Caesar writ,
Is term'd the civil place in all this isle.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. II.

10. Complaisant; civilised; gentle; well bred; elegant of manners; not rude; not brutal; not coarse.

I heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song.

Shakspeare.

He was civil and well natured, never refusing to teach another. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

And fall these sayings from that gentle tongue,
Where civil speech and soft persuasion hung?

Prior.

11. Grave; sober; not gay, or shewy.

A civil habit

Of covers a good man.

Bacon, and Fl. Beggar's Bush.

Thus night oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil suited morn appear.

Milton, Il Pens.

12. Relating to the ancient consular or imperial government; as, civil law.

No woman had it, but a civil doctor.

Shakspeare.

CIVILIAN.† n. s. [civilis, Lat.]

1. One that professes the knowledge of the old Roman law, and of general equity.

The professors of that law, called civilians, because the civil law is their guide, should not be discountenanced nor discouraged.

Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

A depending kingdom is a term of art, unknown to all ancient civilians, and writers upon government.

Suett.

2. A student in civil law at the university.

He [Shenstone] kept his name in the college books, and changed his commoner's gown for that of a civilian.

Graves, Recollect. of Shenstone, p. 36.

CIVILISATION.† n. s. [from civilize.]

1. A law, act of justice, or judgement, which renders a criminal process civil; which is performed by turning an information into an inquest, or the contrary.

Harris.

2. The act of civilizing barbarous people.

It had the most salutary consequences in assisting the general growth of refinement and the progression of civilisation.

Warton.

America was not peopled by any nation of the ancient continent, which had made considerable progress in civilisation.

Robertson.

3. The state of being civilized or reclaimed from barbarism.

CIVILIST.* n. s. [from civil.] A civilian.

If as a religionist he entered into society, it was for a reason different from that for which, as a civilist, he invented a commonwealth. Warburton, All. of Ch. and State, (1st edit.) p. 34.

CIVILITY.† n. s. [from civil.]

1. Freedom from barbarity; the state of being civilised.

The English were at first as stout and warlike a people as ever the Irish; and yet are now brought unto that civility, that no nation excelleth them in all goodly conversation, and all the studies of knowledge and humanity.

Spenser on Ireland.

Divers great monarchies have risen from barbarism to civility, and fallen again to ruin.

Davies on Ireland.

Wheresoe'er her conquering eagles fled,

Arts, learning, and civility were spread.

Denham, Poems.

2. Politeness; complaisance; elegance of behaviour.

Art thou thus bolden'd, man, by thy distress;

Or else a rude despiser of good manners,

That in civility thou seem'st so empty?

Shakspeare.

He, by his great civility and affability, wrought very much upon the people.

Clarendon, b. viii.

I should be kept from a publication, did not what your civility calls a request, your greatness, command.

South.

We, in point of civility, yield to others, in our own houses.

Swift.

3. Rule of decency; practice of politeness.

Love taught him shame; and shame, with love at strife,

Soon taught the sweet civilities of life.

Dryden.

4. Partaking of the nature of a civilized state; growing out of the civil law.

As matrimony hath something in it of nature, something of civility, something of divinity, as instituted by God and by Him to be regulated; so sure this last interest ought to over-sway the other two.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. iii. 10.

If there were nothing in marriage but meer civility, the magistrate might be meet to be employed in this service.

Ibid. iv. 8.

To CIVILIZE.† v. a. [old Fr. civilizer.] To reclaim from savageness and brutality; to instruct in the arts of regular life.

We send the graces and the muses forth,

To civilize and to instruct the North.

Waller.

Musæus first, then Orpheus civilize

Mankind, and give the world their deities.

Denham.

Amongst those who are accounted the civilized part of mankind, this original law of nature still takes place.

Locke.

Osiris, or Bacchus, is reported to have civilized the Indians, and reigned amongst them fifty-two years.

Arbuthnot on Cons.

CIVILIZER.† n. s. [from civilize.]

He that reclaims others from a wild and savage life; he that teaches the rules and customs of civility.

The civilizers! — the disturbers, say; —

The robbers, the corrupters of mankind!

Philips, Briton.

CIVILLY. adv. [from civil.]

1. In a manner relating to government, or to the rights or character of a member of a community; not naturally.

Men that are civil lead their lives after one common law; for that a multitude should, without harmony, concur in the doing of one thing; for this is civilly to live; or should manage community of life, is not possible.

Hooker, b. i.

2. Not criminally.

That accusation, which is publick, is either civilly commenced for the private satisfaction of the party injured; or else criminally, that is, for some publick punishment.

Ayliffe.

3. Politely; complaisantly; gently; without rudeness; without brutality.

I will deal civilly with his poems: nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead.

Dryden, Pref. to his Fables.

I would have had Almeria and Osmyn parted civilly; as it was not proper for lovers to do so.

Collier of the Stage.

He thought them folks that lost their way,

And ask'd them civilly to stay.

Prior.

4. Without gay or gaudy colours.

The chambers were handsome and cheerful, and furnished civilly.

Baron, New Atlantis.

CIZAR.* n. s. [Dr. Johnson observes under scissor, that the word is also variously written cisars, cizars, and scissars; from the Fr. ciseaux. The spelling of cizars, cissers, and cisclets, for the little pair of sheers, or blades, is that of our old lexicography.

Huloet and Sherwood.

An operation of art, produced by a pair of cizars.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, &c. edit. 1705. p. 293.

To CIZAR.* v. a. [from the noun.] To clip; to trim with a pair of scissars.

Let me know,

Why mine own barber is unblest; with him

My poor chin too; for 'tis not cizard just

To such a favourite's glass.

Beaumont and Fl. Two Nob. Kinsm.

CIZE.† n. s. [perhaps from incisa, Lat. shaped or cut to a certain magnitude.] The quantity of any thing with regard to its external form; often written size.

If no motion can alter bodies, that is, reduce them to some other cize or figure, then there is none of itself to give them the cize and figure which they have.

Grew, Cosmol.

CLACK.† n. s. [klatschen, Germ. to rattle; to make a noise, Dr. Johnson says; but we may refer, more plausibly, to the old Fr. clac, clacquet; or rather to the Teut. klack, a shrill noise. Mr. Tooke pronounces it the past participle of the verb click. But see To CLACK.]

1. Any thing that makes a lasting and importunate noise; generally used, in contempt, for the tongue.

But still his tongue ran on,

And with its everlasting clack,

Set all men's ears upon the rack.

Hudibras.

Can any sober person think it reasonable, that the publick devotions of a whole congregation should be under the conduct and at the mercy, of a pert, empty, conceited holderforth, whose chief (if not sole) intent is to vaunt his spiritual clack?

South, Serm. ii. 117.

Fancy flows in, and muse flies high;

He knows not when my clack will lie.

Prior.

2. The CLACK of a Mill. A bell that rings when more corn is required to be put in; or, that which strikes the hopper, and promotes the running of the corn.

Says John, just at the hopper will I stand,
And mark the clack how justly it will sound. Betterton.

To CLACK.† v. n. [old Fr. cliquer, claqueter, cliquer; but some refer it to the Gr. κλάγω, whence the Lat. clangicare; and some to the old Goth. klaka, to make a noise like birds.]

1. To make a chinking noise.

2. To let the tongue run.

To CLACK.† v. a. [qui clachent laines, who clack wool. Kelham, Norm. Dict.] As to clack wool, is to cut off the sheep's mark, which makes it to weigh less, and so yield the less custom to the king.

Cowell.

CLACK-DISH. n. s.* [from clack and dish.] A beggar's dish; a wooden dish with a moveable cover, which they clacked, to excite the notice of passengers, or to signify the dish was empty. A custom in some parts of Oxfordshire is not yet extinct for the poor people and children, about Easter, to go a clucking, that is, with wooden bowls, and the like, to make a noise at the houses of their betters, in order to obtain the accustomed donations of money or meat. But see CLAP-DISH.

His use was, to put a duet in her clack-dish.
Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

CLACKER. n. s.* The same as the clack of a mill.

This they find by the noise of those boat mills;—their clackers beat much slower at those times than else.

Blount's Voyage into the Levant, (1650,) p. 18.

CLACKING. n. s.* [from the verb.] Prating.

Any thing rather than to weary the world with his foolish clacking.
Rp. Hall, Hor. of the Mar. Clergy, § 19.

CLAD.† part. pret. [This participle, which is now referred to clothe, seems originally to have belonged to cleden, or some such word, like klerden, Dutch, Dr. Johnson says. But clad is the Sax. clæd, ge-clæsed, clothed.] Clothied; invested; garbed.

So oft in feasts with costly changes clad,
Sidney.

To crammed maw, a spratt new stomach brings.
Kings, xi. 29.

He had clad himself with a new garment. Beyond

The flowery dale of Sibma, clad with vine, Milton, P. L.

Their prayers clad

With incense, where the golden altar fum'd

By their great intercessor. Milton, P. L.

But virtue too, as well as vice, is clad

In flesh and blood. Waller.

To her the weeping heavens become serene;

For her the ground is clad in cheerful green. Dryden.

The courtiers were all most magnificently clad. Swift.

To CLAIM.† v. a. [clamer, Fr.]

1. To demand of right; to require authoritatively; not to beg or accept as favour, but to exact as due.

If only one man hath a divine right to obedience, nobody can claim that obedience but he that can shew his right.

Locke.

We must know how the first ruler, from whom any one claims, came by his authority, before we can know who has a right to succeed him in it.

Locke.

Poets have undoubted right to claim

If not the greatest, the most lasting name. Congreve.

2. To call; to name. Written by Spenser, who also uses the substantive in a similar sense, clame. [old Fr. clamer, nommer, appeller.]

Nor all, that else through all the world is named
To all the heathen gods, might like to this be claimed.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 30.

CLAIM.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A demand of any thing, as due.

You, in the right of lady Blanch your wife,

May then make all the claim that Arthur did. Shakspeare.

Forsworn thy self! The traitor's odious name

I first return, and then disprove thy claim. Dryden.

Will he not, therefore, of the two evils chuse the least, by submitting to a master, who hath no immediate claim upon him, rather than to another, who hath already revived several claims upon him. Swift.

2. A title to any privilege or possession in the hands of another.

Either there must have been but one sovereign over them all, or else every father of a family hath been as good a prince, and had as good a claim to royalty as these. Locke.

3. In law.

A demand of any thing that is in the possession of another, or at the least out of his own: as claim by charter, claim by descent. Cowell.

4. The phrases are commonly to make claim, or to lay claim.

The king of Prussia lays in his claim for Neuf-Châtel, as he did for the principality of Orange. Addison on Italy.

If God, by positive grant, gave dominion to any man, primogeniture can lay no claim to it, unless God ordained.

Locke.

5. A call. Written by Spenser clame.

I knockt, but no man answerd me by name;

I calld, but no man answerd to my clame. Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 11.

CLAIMABLE.† adj. [old Fr. clamable.] That which may be demanded as due; challengeable. Cotgrave.

CLAIMANT.† n. s. [old Fr. clamant.] He that demands any thing as unjustly detained by another.

Such claimants might have the true right, but yet, by the death of witnesses or other defect of evidence, be unable to prove it to a jury. Blackstone.

CLAIMER.† n. s. [from claim.] He that makes a demand: he that requires any thing, as unjustly withheld from him.

His funeral was fain to be deferred till an agreement was made, and the value of the ground paid to the claimer.

Temple, Introduction to Hist. of Eng. p. 296.

CLAIR-OBSCURE. n. s. See CLARE-OBSCURE.

CLAIMANT. adj.* [from clamo, Lat. to cry. A word perhaps coined by Thomson.] Crying; beseeching earnestly.

Instant o'er his shivering thought

Comes winter unprovided, and a train

Of claimant children dear. Thomson, Autumn, ver. 349.

To CLAM.† v. a. [in some provinces, to cleam, from clæman, Sax. to glew together. Written also sometimes clém. Germ. klemmen, to tie. Somner gives the Sax. clain, a band or tie. Old Goth. kleima, to besmear. Clammed up is, in some of our provinces, clogged or choaked up. To clém, though sometimes written and pronounced clam, is to hunger-starve. See To CLÉM.] To clog with any glutinous matter.

A swarm of wasps got into a honey-pot, and there they cloyed and clammed themselves, 'till there was no getting out again.

L'Estrange.

The sprigs were all dawbed with lime, and the birds clammed and taken. L'Estrange.

To CLAM. v. n.* To be moist.

A chilling sweat, a damp of jealousy,

Hangs on my brows, and clams upon my limbs. Dryden, Amphitryon.

To CLAM.* v. n. [perhaps from clamour. See To CLAMOUR.] A term in ringing, which Dr. Johnson, in his remarks on Shakspeare, confounds with buffeting; for, to clam a bell, he says, is to cover the clapper with felt, which drowns the blow and hinders the sound. This is, however, to buffet. See To BUFFET. To clam, is to unite certain sounds in the peal.

Clamming is when each concord strikes together, which being done true, the eight will strike but as four bells, and make a melodious harmony. School of Recreation, 1684.

To CLAMBER. v. n. [probably corrupted from climb; as climber, clamber.] To climb with difficulty; as with both hands and feet.

The kitchen malkin pins
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck,
Clamb'ring the walls to eye him. Shakspeare.

When you hear the drum,
Clamber not you up to the easements then. Shakspeare.
The men there do not without some difficulty clamber up the acclivities, dragging their kine with them.

Ray, on the Creation.
They were forced to clamber over so many rocks, and to tread upon the brink of so many precipices, that they were very often in danger of their lives. Addison, Freshwater.

CLAMMINESS. n. s. [from clammy.] Viscosity; viscosity; tenacity; ropiness.

A greasy pipkin will spoil the clamminess of the glew.

CLAMMY.* adj. [Dutch klam, clammy; Su. klem-mig.] Viscous; glutinous; tenacious; adhesive; ropy.

Bodies clammy and cleaving, have an appetite, at once, to follow another body, and to hold to themselves.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Neither the brain nor spirits can conserve motion; the former is of such a clammy consistence, it can no more retain it than a quagmire. Glaucille, Scopsis.

Aghast he wak'd, and, starting from his bed,
Cold sweats, in clammy drops, his limbs o'erspread. Dryden.
Joyful thou'lt see

The clammy surface all o'er strown with tribes
Of greedy insects. Philips.

There is an unctuous clammy vapour that arises from the stem of grapes, when they lie mashed together in the vat, which puts out a light, when dipped into it. Addison on Italy.

The continuance of the fever, clammy sweats, paleness, and at last a total cessation of pain, are signs of a gangrene and approaching death. Arbutnot on Diet.

CLAMOROUS.* adj. [old Fr. clamoreux.] Vociferous; noisy; turbulent; loud.

It is no sufficient argument to say, that, in urging these ceremonies, none are so clamorous as Papists, and they whom Papists suborn.

He kiss'd her lips
With such a clamorous smack, that at the parting
All the church echo'd. Shakspeare.

At my birth
The goats ran from the mountains, and the herds
Were strangely clam'rous in the frighted fields. Shakspeare.

With the clam'rous report of war,
Thus will I drown your exclamations. Shakspeare.

Then various elements against thee joind
In one more various animal combin'd,
And fram'd the clam'rous race of busy human kind. Pope.

A pamphlet that will settle the wavering, instruct the ignorant, and inflame the clamorous. Swift.

CLAMOROUSLY.* adv. [from clamorous.] In a violent or noisy manner.

Disturbances and sad rencounters in it do clamorously tell us, we come not into the world to run a race of delight.

Where a jest, a grin, or a laugh, will carry it off, they are unmerciful and triumph clamorously. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 23.

Lestle, Sh Meth. whh Deists, Pref.

CLAMOUR.* n. s. [old Fr. clamour, clameour, clameur; Lat. clamor.]

1. Outcry; noise; exclamation; vociferation.

Revoke thy doom,
Or whilst I can vent clamour from my throat,
I'll tell thee, thou do'st evil. Shakspeare.
The people grew then exorbitant in their clamours for justice. King Charles.

The maid
Shall weep the fury of m^t love decay'd;
And weeping follow me, as thou do'st now,
With idle clamours of a broken vow. Prior.

2. It is used sometimes, but less fitly, of inanimate things.

Here the loud Arno's lust'rous clamours cease,
That with submissive murmurs glides in peace. Addison.

To CLAMOUR. v. n. [from the noun.] To make outcries; to exclaim; to vociferate; to roar in turbulence.

The obscure bird clamour'd the live-long night. Shakspeare.

To CLAMOUR.* v. a [The following example from Bacon is placed by Dr. Johnson under the verb neuter; under which also he introduces, from Shakspeare, "Clamour your tongues, and not a word more," as seeming to mean actively, to stop from noise; which is a meaning that has been justly disputed; and the passage is yet left open to conjecture.] To stun or overpower with noise.

Let them not come in multitudes, or in a tribunitious manner; for that is to clamour counsels, not to inform them. Bacon, Essays.

To CLAMOUR bells.* A term in ringing, according to Warburton, which other commentators on Shakspeare imagine to be merely his own opinion. It is, however, probable. To encrease the strokes of the clapper on the bell, in falling it.

When bells are at the height, in order to cease them, the repetition of the strokes becomes much quicker than before; this is called clamouring them. Warburton.

CLAMOURER.* n. s. [from clamour.] He who makes an outcry or clamour.

The non-residence therefore of the minister, or even his neglects of duty, are a mere pretence set up against paying tithes; and I am afraid that if he would graciously remit his dues, too many of these clamourers would readily dispense with his residence. Abp. Hort's Charge.

CLAMP. n. s. [clamp, French.]

1. A piece of wood joined to another, as an addition of strength.

2. A quantity of bricks.
To burn a clamp of brick of sixteen thousand, they allow seven ton of coals. Mortimer, Husbandry.

To CLAMP. v. a. [from the noun.]

When a piece of board is fitted with the grain to the end of another piece of board cross the grain, the first board is clamped. Thus the ends of tables are commonly clamped to preserve them from warping. Moxon's Mech. Exercises.

CLAN.* n. s. [probably of Scottish original; klann, in the Highlands, signifies children.] So far Dr. Johnson. Ir. clann. Mr. Chalmers observes, that it is the general denomination among the Irish, and Scots-Irish Celts, for the numerous tribes, into which they were divided.]

1. A family; a race.

They around the flag
Of each his faction, in their several clans,
Swarm populous, unnumbered.

Milton, P. I.

CLANG.† n. s. [klang, Germ. clangor, Lat. κλάγγη, Gr.] A sharp, shrill noise.

With such a horrid clang

As on mount Sinai rang,

While the red fire and smould'ring clouds out brake.

Milton, Ode.

An island, salt and bare,
The haunt of seals and orcs, and sea-mews clang.

Milton, P. II.

What clangs were heard in German skies afar,
Of arms and armies rushing to the war!

Dryden.

Guns, and trumpets clang, and solemn sound
Of drums, o'ercame their groans.

Philips.

To CLANG. v. n. [clango, Lat.] To clatter; to make a loud shrill noise.

Have I not in a pitched battle heard

Loud 'larums, neighing steeds, and trumpets clang?

Shakspeare.

The Lybians clad in armour, lead

The dance; and clanging swords and shields they beat.

To CLANG. v. a. To strike together with a noise.

The fierce Curetes trod tumultuous

Their mystick dance, and clang'd their sounding arms;

Industrious with the warlike din to quell

Thy infant cries.

Prior.

CLANGOUR.† n. s. [old Fr. clangueur, Lat. clangor.] A loud shrill sound.

In death he cried,

Like to a dismal clangour heard from far,
Warwick, revenge my death.

Shakspeare.

Their ears were full of clangor, their hearts of horror.

Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1639), p. 265.

With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,

And hear the trumpet's clangour pierce the sky.

Dryden.

CLANGOUS.† adj. [old Fr. clangueux.] Making a clang.

They've always been at daggers-drawing,
And one another clapperclawing. Hudibras.

CLARE.* n. s. A nun of the order of St. Clare; called also a Minorette, as their house without Aldgate in which they were settled, when first brought into England about the close of the thirteenth century, was, the Minories. These nuns are sometimes termed "poor Clares." They had, in this country, three other houses besides that in London already noticed.

CLA'RENCEUX, or CLA'RENCIEUX. n. s. The second king at arms: so named from the dutchy of Clarence.

C L A

CLARE-OBSCURE. n. s. [from clarus, bright, and obscurus, Lat.] Light and shade in painting.

As masters in the clare-obscure,
With various light your eyes allure;
A flaming yellow here they spread,
Draw off in blue, or charge in red;
Yet from these colours, oddly mix'd,
Your sight upon the whole is fix'd. Prior.

CLARET. n. s. [claret, Fr.] French wine, of a clear pale-red colour.

Red and white wine are in a trice confounded into claret.
Boyle.

The claret smooth, red as the lips we press
In sparkling fancy, while we drain the bowl. Thomson.

CLARICHORD. n. s. [from clarus and chorda, Latin.] A musical instrument in form of a spinette, but more ancient. It has forty-nine or fifty keys, and seventy strings. Chambers.

The clarichord hath a tunely kynde,
As the wyre is wrested high and low. Skelton, Poems, p. 291.

CLARIFICATION. n. s. [from clarify.] The act of making any thing clear from impurities.

Liquors are, many of them, at the first, thick and troubled; as muste, and wort: to know the means of accelerating clarification, we must know the causes of clarification.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CLARIFY. v. a. [clarifier, French. But see CLEAR.]

1. To purify or clear any liquor; to separate from feculences or impurities.

The apothecaries clarify their syrups by whites of eggs, beaten with the juices which they would clarify; which whites of eggs gather all the dregs and grosser parts of the juice to them; and after, the syrup being set on the fire, the whites of eggs themselves harden, and are taken forth.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

They cast therein three or four bruised almonds; they, in less than an hour, clarify it like crystal; which effect they have upon no other water. Blount, Voyage into the Levant, p. 105.
Such [places,] as is the general site of Bohemia, the north-wind clarifies. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 259.

2. To brighten; to illuminate. This sense is rare. Dr. Johnson says; and he cites the authority only of South. This meaning, however, seems to have been not uncommon. Formerly the word signified to glorify or make famous: "Fadir, the hour cometh, clarify thy sonne." Wicliffe, St. John, xvii.

Many boys are muddy-headed, till they be clarified with age; and such afterwards prove the best. Fuller's Holy State, p. 100.

The will was then ductile and pliant to all the motions of right reason: it met the dictates of a clarified understanding half way. South, Sermons.

The Christian religion is the only means that God has sanctified, to set fallen man upon his legs again, to clarify his reason, and to rectify his will. South, Sermons.

Nouns for brevity are sometimes verbalized; as, to complete, to contrary, to experience; sometimes by fy affixed, as, to make clear, to clarify, to beautify.

Instruct. for Oratory, (Ox. 1682,) p. 32.

Our affection being perfectly subdued to the reason of our minds, and drained and clarified from all its gross and carnal love. Scott, Sermon, xxi.

To CLARIFY. v. n. To clear up, to grow bright.

Whosoever hath his mind fraught with many thoughts, his wits and understanding do clarify and break up in the discoursing with another; he marshalleth his thoughts more orderly, he seeth how they look when they are turned into words. Bacon, Essays.

CLARINET. n. s. [Fr. clarinette.] A kind of haut-boy, but of a shriller tone.

C L A

CLARION. n. s. [old Fr. claron; Span. clarin; low Lat. clario, from clarus, loud.] A trumpet; a wind instrument of war.

And after, to his palace he them brings,
With shannus, and trumpets, and with clarions sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings. Spenser, F. Q.

Then strait commands, that at the warlike sound
Of trumpets loud, and clarions, be uprear'd
The mighty standard. Milton, P. L.

Let fuller notes th' applauding world amaze,
And the loud clarion labour in your praise. Pope.

CLARITUDE. n. s. [Lat. claritudo.] Splendour; any thing bright. Not in use.

Amongst those claritudes which gild the skies.
Beaumont's Psyche, vii. 57.

CLARITY. n. s. [clarté, and clerté, old French; claritas, Latin. Written originally clerte. "The holy cite Jerusalem — having the clerte of God, and the light of it lyke a precious stoon, &c." Wicliffe, Apoc. xxi.] Brightness; splendour.

A light by abundant clarity invisible; an understanding which itself can only comprehend. St. Walter Ralegh.
Man was not only deceivable in his integrity, but the angels of light in all their clarity. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CLARY. n. s. [herminium, Lat.] An herb.

Plants that have circled leaves do all abound with moisture. The weakest kind of earling is roughness: as in clary and burr. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CLARY. v. n. [from the Lat. clarus, shrill.] To make a loud or shrill noise.

The crane that goeth before — if aught he to be avoyded, gives warning thereof by clarying.
A. Golding's Tr. of Soliman, (1587,) ch. 14.

To CLASH. v. n. [klatsen, Dut. to make a noise; or rather from the Germ. klatschen.]

1. To make a noise by mutual collision; to strike one against another.

Three times, as of the clashing sound
Of arms, we heard. Denham.

Those few that should happen to clash, might rebound after the collision. Bentley.

How many candles may send out their light, without clashing upon one another; which argues the smallness of the parts of light, and the largeness of the interstices between particles of air and other bodies. Cheyne, Phil. Princ.

2. To act with opposite power, or contrary direction.

Neither was there any queen-mother who might clash with his counsellors for authority. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Those that are not convinced what help this is to magistracy, would find it, if they should chance to clash. South, Sermons.

3. To contradict, to oppose.

Wherever there are men, there will be clashing sometime or other; and a knock, or a contest, spoils all. L'Estrange.

The absurdity in this instance is obvious; and yet every time that clashing metaphors are put together, this fault is committed. Spectator, No. 395.

To CLASH. v. a. To strike one thing against another, so as to produce a noise.

The nodding statue clash'd his arms,
And with a sullen sound and feeble cry,
Half sunk, and half pronounced the word of victory. Dryden.

CLASH. n. s. [from the verb. Germ. also klatsch.]

1. A noisy collision of two bodies.

I heard no words between them, but what their weapons spoke, clash and clatter. Beaumont and F. Maid in the Mill.

The clash of arms and voice of men we hear. Denham.

He nobly seiz'd thee in the dire alarms
Of war and slaughter and the clash of arms. Pope.

2. Opposition; contradiction.

Then from the clashes between popes and kings,
Debate, like sparks from flint's collision, springs. Denham.

In the very next line he reconciles the fathers and scripture, and shews there is no clash betwixt them. Atterbury.

CLASHING.* n. s. [from clash.] Opposition; enmity; contradiction.

Good Lord! what fiery clashings we have had lately for a cap and a surplice! Hewell, Lett. iv. 29.

Yet still the man shall find a civil war within himself, a great scuffle and disturbance, his thoughts divided between contrary principles, the clashings of prudence and revenge. South, Sermon. viii. 185.

CLASP.† n. s. [chespe, Dutch, according to Dr. Johnson. Serenius refers to the old Goth. klypa, to bind closely; which may countenance a supposition that clasp may be a corruption of our word clip, to embrace.]

1. A hook to hold any thing close; as a book, or garment.

The scorpion's claw here grasp a wide extent,
And here the crabs in lesser *clasp*s are bent. Addison.

He took me aside, opening the *clasp*s of the parchment cover. Arbuthnot and Pope.

2. An embrace, in contempt.

Your fair daughter,
Transported with no worse nor better guard,
But with a knave of hire, a gondalier,
To the gross *clasp*s of a lascivious Moor. Shakespeare.

TO CLASP. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To shut with a clasp.

Sermons are the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and do open the scriptures; which being but read, remain, in comparison, still clasped. Hooker, v. 22.

There Caxton slept, with Wynkin at his side,
One clasp'd in wood, and one in strong cow-hide. Pope.

2. To catch and hold by twining.

Direct
The clasping ivy where to climb. Milton, P. L.

3. To hold with the hands extended; to inclose between the hands.

Occasion turneth the handle of the bottle first to be received, and after the belly, which is hard to clasp. Bacon, Ess.

4. To embrace.

Thou art a slave, whom fortune's tender arm
With favour never claspt, but bred a dog. Shakespeare.

Thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees. Milton, P. L.

He stoop'd below
The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd blow;
Then creeping, clasp'd the heroes knees, and pray'd. Dryden.

Now, now he clasps her to his panting breast;
Now he devours her with his eager eyes. Smith.

5. To inclose.

Boys, with women's voices,
Strive to speak big, and clasp their female joints,
In stiff unwieldy arms against thy crown. Shakespeare.

CLASPER. n. s. [from clasp.] The tendrils or threads of creeping plants, by which they cling to other things for support.

The tendrils or claspers of plants are given only to such species as have weak and infirm stalks. Ray on the Creation.

CLASPKNIFE. n. s. [from clasp and knife.] A knife which folds into the handle.

CLASS.† n. s. [old Fr. classe, a rank, order, &c. Cotgrave; Lat. classis.]

1. A rank or order of persons.

Seranis has distinguished the readers of poetry according to their capacity of judging, into three classes. Dryden.

2. An assembly of persons, within a certain division.

Assemblies are either classes or synods: classes are conferences of the fewest ministers of churches, standing near together, as for example of twelve.

Bp. Bancroft, Dangerous Positions, &c. iii. 13.
The kingdom of England, instead of so many dioceses, was now [during the great rebellion,] divided into a certain number of provinces, made up of representatives from the several classes within their respective boundaries. Every parish had a congregational or parochial presbytery for the affairs of its own circle; these parochial presbyteries were combined into classes, which chose representatives for the provincial assembly, as did the provincial for the national. Thus, the city of London being distributed into twelve classes, each class chose two ministers and four lay-elders, to represent them in a provincial assembly. Warton, Notes on Milton's Poems.

2. A number of boys, learning the same lesson at the school.

We shall be seized away from this lower class in the school of knowledge, and our conversation shall be with angels and illuminated spirits. Watts on the Mind.

3. A set of beings or things; a number ranged in distribution, under some common denomination.

Among this herd of politicians, any one set make a very considerable class of men. Addison, Freeholder.

Whatever of mongrel, no one class admits
A wit with dunces, and a dunce with wits. Pope, Dunciad.

TO CLASS. v. a. [from the noun.] To range according to some stat'd method of distribution; to range according to different ranks.

I considered that by the classing and methodizing such passages, I might instruct the reader. Arbuthnot on Coins.

CLASSICAL.† } adj. [old Fr. classique, Lat. classicus.]
CLASSICK. }

1. Relating to antique authors; relating to literature. Addison is supposed to be the first who thus applied the word, and was ridiculed for it.

Poetick fields encompass me around,
And still I seem to tread on classick ground. Addison.

With them the genius of classick learning dwelleth, and from them it is derived. Felton on the Classicks.

2. Of the first order or rank. This is the old meaning of the word; Cotgrave and Bullokar define it approved, orderly, in due or fit rank, authentical, chief. "Authors of best note, and generally applauded, are called classical." Bullok. ed. 1656. See the subst. CLASSICK.

May his just fame remain a known and classick history, describing him, in his full portraiture, among the best of subjects, of friends, of scholars, and of men. Fell's Life of Hammond.

From this standard the value of the Roman weights and coins are deduced: in the settling of which I have followed Mr. Greaves, who may be justly reckoned a classical author on this subject. Arbuthnot on Coins.

3. Relating to the order and rules of the presbyterian assemblies. See CLASS.

We perceive it [presbyterian government] aspiring to be a compulsive power upon all without exception in parochial, classical, and provincial hierarchies.

Milton, Observ. Art. of Peace betw. E. of Orm. and Irish.

Surely when we put down bishops and put up presbyters, which the most of them have made use of to enrich and exalt themselves, and turn the first heel against their benefactors, we did not think, that one classick fraternity, so obscure and so remote, should involve us and all state-affairs within the censure and jurisdiction of Belfast, upon pretence of overseeing their own charge.

Milton, Observ. Art. of Peace betw. the E. of Orm. and Irish.

Dare ye for this adjure the civil sword
To force our consciences that Christ set free,
And ride us with a classick hierarchy?

Milton on the New Forcers of Conscience.

After they have so long contended for their classical ordination, will they at length submit to any episcopal?

Dryden, Pref. to Hind and Panther.

Mr. Baxter takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren, but claws off the episcopal party as a set of Cassandrian priests. Bp. Nicholson to Mr. Yates, 1699.

CLASSICALLY.* adv. [from classical.] In a classical manner.

CLASSICK.† n. s. [classicus, Lat.] An author of the first rank: usually taken for ancient authors. They are called classicks, from the circumstance of the senators, in the comitia centuriata of the Romans, voting first; all other persons, who voted afterwards, being styled infra classem.

The classicks of an age that heard of none. Pope.

CLASSIFICATION.* n. s. [from classis and facio, Lat.] Ranging into classes and divisions.

In the classification of the citizens, the great legislators of antiquity made the greatest display of their powers. Burke.

TO CLASSIFY.* v. a. [from classis.] To arrange.

CLASSIS.† n. s. [Latin.]

1. Order; sort; body.

He had declared his opinion of that classis of men, and did all he could to hinder their growth. Clarendon.

2. A convention or assembly of persons, within a particular district.

Give to your rough gown, wherever they meet it, whether in pulpit, classis, or provincial synod, the precedence and the pre-eminence of deceiving. Milton, Obscure Art. of Peace betw. E. of Orn. and Irish.

TO CLATTER.† v. n. [clapung; a rattle, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. But it is rather from the Teut. klatteren, to make a noise.]

1. To make a noise by knocking two sonorous bodies frequently together.

Now the sprightly trumpet, from afar,
Had rous'd the neighing steeds to scour the fields,
While the fierce riders clatter'd on their shields. Dryden.

2. To utter a noise by being struck together.

All that night was heard an unwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running to and fro. Knolles's History.

Down sunk the monster-bulk, and press'd the ground;
His arms and clattering shield on the vast body sound. Dryden.

Their clattering arms with the fierce shocks resound,
Helmets and broken lances spread the ground. Granville.

3. To talk fast and idly.

Here is a great deal of good matter
Lost for lack of telling;
Now, sike, I see thou do'st but clatter;
Harm may come of melling. Spenser, Shep. Cal.

But since he must needs be the loadstar of reformation, as some men clatter, it will be good to see further his knowledge of religion what it was, and by that we may likewise guess at the sincerity of his times in those that were not heretical. Milton, of Ref. in England.

TO CLATTER. v. a.

1. To strike any thing so as to make it sound and rattle.

I only with an ouken staff will meet thee,
And raise such outcries on thy clatter'd iron,
That thou oft' shalt wish thyself at Gath. Milton, S. A.

When all the bees are gone to settle,
You clatter still your brazen kettle. Swift.

2. To dispute, jar, or clamour. Martin. A low word.

CLATTER.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A rattling noise made by the frequent and quick collision of sonorous bodies. A clatter is a clash often repeated with great quickness, and seems to convey the idea of a sound sharper and shriller than rattle. See the verb, and its derivation from klatteren. The Sax. cleasup is clatter or clutter.]

I have seen a monkey overthrow all the dishes and plates in a kitchen, merely for the pleasure of seeing them tumble, and hearing the clatter they made in their fall. Swift.

2. It is used for any tumultuous and confused noise.

By this great clatter, one of greatest note
Seems bruited. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Grow to be short,
Throw by your clatter,
And handle the matter. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

O Rourke's jolly boys
Ne'er dreamt of the matter,
'Till rous'd by the noise,
And musical clatter.

Swift.

The jumbling particles of matter,
In chaos make not such a clatter.

Swift.

CLATTERER.* n. s. [from clatter.]

1. He who makes any noise.

Holy-water, swyngers, and even-song clatterers, with other hypocrites. Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 88. b.

2. One who will disclose any light secret. Huloet.

CLATTERING.* n. s. [Sax. clarpunge.] A noise; mere clamour; rattle.

All those airy speculations, which bettered not men's manners, were only a noise and clattering of words. Decay of Christian Piety.

CLAVATED. adj. [clavatus, Lat.] Knobbed; set with knobs.

These appear plainly to have been clavated spikes of some kind of echinus ovarius. Woodward on Fossils.

CLAUDENT. adj. [claudens, Lat.] Shutting; inclosing; confining. Dict.

CLAUDICANT.* adj. [claudico, Lat.] Limping; halting.

TO CLAUDICATE. v. n. [claudico, Lat.] To halt; to limp. Dict.

CLAUDICATION.† n. s. [old Fr. claudication, from the Lat. claudico.] The act or habit of halting; lameness. Cotgrave.

CLAVE. [the preterite of clavare.] See CLEAVE.

CLAVELLATED. adj. [clavellatus, low Lat.] Made with burnt tartar. A chymical term. Chambers.

Air, transmitted through clavellated ashes into an exhausted receiver, loses weight as it passes through them. Arbutnot.

CLAVER.† n. s. [clæpen pyrt, Sax.] This is now universally written clover, though not so properly. See CLOVER. Mr. Pegge pronounces claver, however, to be a corruption of pronunciation for clover; which is so far from being the case, that claver is more analogous to the etymology, and is also used by an author of good note.

The desert with sweet claver fills,
And richly shades the joyfull hills. Sandys, Ps. p. 101.

CLAVICHORD.* n. s. [from clavis and chorda, Lat.] An instrument having many strings of one sound, saving that, with small pieces of cloth, the sound is distinct. Barret's Alv. 1580. Another name, perhaps, for the clurichord, which see.

CLAVICLE.† n. s. [old Fr. clavicule, from clavicula, Lat.] The collar bone.

Some quadrupeds can bring their fore feet unto their mouths; as most that have clavicles, or collar bones. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A girl was brought with angry wheal down her neck, towards the clavicle. Wiceman, Surgery.

CLAUSE.† n. s. [old Fr. clause, from the Lat. part. clausa of claudere, to shut up or close. This substantive formerly signified an end or conclusion, a close; and is so used by Chaucer.]

1. A sentence; a single part of a discourse; a subdivision of a larger sentence; so much of a sentence as is to be construed together.

God may be glorified by obedience, and obeyed by performance of his will, although no special clause or sentence of scripture be in every such action set before men's eyes to warrant it. Hooker, ii. § 2.

2. An article or particular stipulation.

The clause is untrue concerning the bishop. Hooker, iv. § 4.
When, after his death, they were sent both to Jews and Gentiles, we find not this clause in their commission. South.

CLAUSURAL.† adj. [old Fr. claustral, from the Lat. claustrum; "pricur claustral," Cotgrave.] Relating to a cloister, or religious house.

Claustal priors are such as preside over monasteries, next to the abbot or chief governour in such religious houses.

This Dunstane—compelled men and women to vow chastity and to keep claustrale obedience.

Bale, Eng. Potarics, P. i. fol. 62.
This might better be verified of claustral monks and nuns.

CLAUSURE. n. s. [clausura, Lat.] Confinement; the act of shutting; the state of being shut.

In some monasteries the severity of the clausure is hard to be born.

CLAW.† n. s. [clap, Saxon; klauw, German.]

1. The foot of a beast or bird, armed with sharp nails; or the pincers or holders of a shell fish.

I saw her range abroad to seek her food,
T' embrace her teeth and claws with lukewarm blood.

Spenser, Vis. of Belloy.

What's justice to a man, or laws,
That never comes within their claws?

He softens the harsh rigour of the laws,
Blunts their keen edge, and grinds their harpy claws.

2. Sometimes a hand, in contempt.

TO CLAW.† v. a. [clapan, Sax.]

1. To tear with nails or claws.

Look, if the wither'd elder hath not his poll claw'd like a parrot.

2. To pull, as with the nails.

I am afraid we shall not easily claw off that name.

3. To tear or scratch in general.

For Age with stealing steps

Hath claw'd me with his crutch.

Old Ballad in Lord Surrey's Poems.

But we must claw ourselves with shameful
And heathen stripes, by their example.

They for their own opinions stand fast,

Only to have them claw'd and cravast.

Oh, the folly of us poor creatures, who, in the midst of our distresses, or ease, are ready to claw or caress one another, upon matters that so seldom depend on our wisdom or our weakness, on our good or evil conduct towards each other.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

4. To flatter; which Dr. Johnson calls an obsolete sense, and of which he gives no example; but produces, under a definition of "to scratch or tickle," the passage of Shakspeare cited in the present sense, which is the true meaning of the word. This word is indeed frequently thus employed by our old authors.

I will claw him, and saye, well might he fare!

Using your clawing colour, because some and such do not observe the said injunctions.

Anderson, Expos. of Benedictus, (1573,) fol. 65. b.

Thus golden asses claw'd by clawbacks are.

Dances, Wittes Pilgrimage, O. 4.

I laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour.

Shakspeare, Much Ado.

Men—who have dealt with king Richard, as some trivial clawing pamphletiers, and historical parasites, with the magnificent prelate, Thomas Wolsey.

Sir G. Buck, Hist. of K. Rich. III. p. 78.

5. To claw off, or away. To scold; to rail at.

Mr. Baxter takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren, but claws off the episcopal party as a set of Cassandrian priests.

You thank the place where you found money; but the jade Fortune is to be claw'd away for't, if you should lose it.

L'Estrange.

6. To claw off, in naval language. To beat or turn to windward from a lee shore, so as to escape the danger of shipwreck.

Chambers.

CLAWBACK.† n. s. [from claw and back.] A flatterer; a sycophant; a wheeler. See the 4th sense of To CLAW. Our old lexicography renders this word adulateur.

The miserable clawbacks of our countrie, not regarding what absurdities they commit, so that their wicked hersey may take place.

The overweening of thy wits does make thy foes to smile,
Thy friends to weepe, and clawbacks thee with footings to beguile.

Misgovern'd both my kingdome and my life,
I gave my selfe to ease, to sleepe, and sinne;
And I had clawbacks even at court full rife,
Which sought by outrage golden gaines to winne.

Mir. for Mag. p. 73.

CLAWBACK.* adj. [from the subst.] Flattering; behaving in the manner of a clawback.

Like a claw-back parasite.

CLAWED. adj. [from claw.] Furnished or armed with claws.

Among quadrupeds, of all the clawed, the lion is the strongest.

CLAY.† n. s. [clai, Cimbr. and Welsh; kley, Dutch; clay, clacia, Sax.]

1. Unctuous and tenacious earth, such as will mould into a certain form.

Clays are earths firmly coherent, weighty and compact, stiff, viscid, and ductile to a great degree, while moist; smooth to the touch, not easily breaking between the fingers, nor readily diffusible in water; and, when mixed, not readily subsiding in it.

Deep Acheron,
Whose troubled eddies, thick with coze and clay,
Are whirl'd aloft.

Expose the clay to the rain, to drain it from salts, that the bricks may be more durable.

The sun, which softens wax, will harden clay.

Clover is the best way of improving clays, where manure is scarce.

2. [In poetry.] Earth in general; the terrestrial element.

Why should our clay
Over our spirits so much sway?

3. Dirt, or moistened earth.

When he had spoken thus, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle.

TO CLAY.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover with clay; to manure with clay. This is an old verb in our language; "clayen, to dress with clay."

This manuring lasts fifty years: then the ground must be clayed again.

CLAY-COLD.† adj. [clay and cold.] Lifeless; cold as the unanimated earth. Formerly key-cold was used in the same sense. See KEY-COLD.

I wash'd his clay-cold corse with holy drops,

And saw him laid in hallow'd ground.

Her face was like an April morn,

Clad in a wintry cloud;

And clay-cold was her lilly hand,

That held her sable shrowd.

CLAY-GROUND.* n. s. Ground abounding with clay; thick or heavy ground.

In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them in the clay-ground, between Succoth and Zarthan.

CLAY-PIT. n. s. [clay and pit.] A pit where clay is dug.

'Twas found in a clay-pit.

CLAYES. n. s. [clays, Fr. In fortification.] Wattles made with stakes interwoven with osiers, to cover lodgements.

CLAYEY. adj. [from clay.] Consisting of clay; abounding with clay.

Some in a lax or sandy, some a heavy or clayey soil. Derham.

CLAYISH. † adj. [from clay.] Partaking of the nature of clay; containing particles of clay; or, "full of clay." Hulot.

Small beer proves an unwholesome drink; perhaps, by being brewed with a thick, muddish, and clayish water, which the brewers covet. Harvey on Consumptions.

CLAYMARL. n. s. [clay and marl.] A whitish, smooth, chalky clay.

Claymarl resembles clay, and is near akin to it; but is more fat, and sometimes mixed with chalk-stones.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

CLAYMORE.* n. s. A two-handed sword. See GLAYMORE.

CLAYSTONE.* n. s. A blue and white limestone dug in Gloucestershire. Grose.

CLEAN. † adj. [glan, Welsh; clæne, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. But it is more probably from the Goth. glan, brightness; which Serenius deduces from the Seythick root, hloa, to shine.]

1. Free from dirt or filth; as, clean water.

Both his hands, most filthy feculent,
Above the water were on high extent,
And fain'd to wash themselves incessantly;
Yet nothing cleaner were for such intent,
But rather fouler.

Spenser, F. Q.

They make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess.

St. Matthew, xxiii. 25

2. Free from moral impurity; chaste; innocent; guiltless. [Sax. clæn heoptan, the pure in heart, St. Matt. v. 8.]

Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clæn.

Acts, xviii. 6.

He that bath clæn hands and a pure heart.

Paulus.

Create in me a clæn heart, O God.

Paulus.

3. Elegant; neat; not unwieldy; not encumbered with any thing useless or disproportioned.

The timber and wood are in some trees more clæn, in some more knotty.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Yet thy waist is strait and clæn,
As Cupid's shaft, or Hermes' rod.

Waller.

4. Not foul with any loathsome disease; not leprous. If the plague be somewhat dark, and spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clæn.

Leviticus, xiii. 6.

5. Dexterous; not bungling; feat: as, a clæn trick; a clæn leap; a clæn boxer.

6. Entire.

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clæn riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor and to the stranger.

Levit. xxiii. 22.

CLEAN. † adv. [Sax. adv. clæne.]

1. Quite; perfectly; fully; completely. This sense is now little used. It is of frequent occurrence in our present version of the bible.

Their actions have been clæn contrary unto those before mentioned.

Hooker, i. § 4.

Being seated, and domestick broils

Clean overblown.

Shakespeare.

A philosopher, pressed with the same objection, shapes an answer clæn contrary.

Hamlet on Providence.

2. Without miscarriage; in a dexterous manner.

Pope came off clæn with Homer, but they say

Broome went before, and kindly swept the way.

Henley.

CLEAN-TIMBERED.* adj. [from clæn and timber.]

Well proportioned; borrowed from the application of this adjective to trees. See Lord Bacon under the 3d definition of CLEAN. The phrase is yet in use.

I think, Hector was not so clæn-timber'd: his leg is too big for Hector.

Shakspeare, Love's Lab. Lost.

To CLEAN. † v. a. [Sax. clænan.] To free from dirt or filth.

Their tribes adjusted, clæn'd their vigorous wings,
And many a circle, many a short essay,
Wheel'd round and round.

Thomson.

CLEANLY. adv. [from clænly.] In a cleanly manner.

CLEANLINESS. n. s. [from clænly.]

1. Freedom from dirt or filth.

I shall speak nothing of the extent of this city, the cleanliness of its streets, nor the beauties of its piazza.

Addison on Italy.

2. Neatness of dress; purity; the quality contrary to negligence and nastiness.

The mistress thought it either not to deserve, or not to need any exquisite decking, having no adorning but cleanliness.

Sidney.

From whence the tender skin assumes

A sweetness above all perfumes;

From whence a cleanness remains,

Incapable of outward stains.

Swift.

Such cleanliness from head to heel;

No humours gross, or frowzy steams,

No noisome whiffs, or sweaty streams.

Swift.

CLEANLY. † adj. [Sax. clænlice.]

1. Free from dirtiness; careful to avoid filth; pure in the person.

Next that shall mountain 'sparagus be laid,

Pull'd by some plain but clænly country maid.

Dryden.

An ant is a very clænly insect, and throws out of her nest all the small remains of the corn on which she feeds.

Addison.

2. That which makes cleanliness.

In our fantastick climes, the fair

With clænly powder dry their hair.

Prior.

3. Pure; innocent; immaculate.

Perhaps human nature meets few more sweetly relishing and clænly joys, than those that derive from successful trials.

Glanville.

4. Nice; addressful; artful.

Through his fine handling and his clænly play,

All those royal signs had stole away.

Spenser.

We can secure ourselves a retreat by some clænly evasion.

L' Estrange, Fables.

CLEANLY. † adv.

1. Elegantly; neatly; without nastiness.

If I do grow great, I'll leave sack, and live clænly as a nobleman should.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Whether our natives might not live clænly and comfortably?

Bp. Berkeley, Quæst. § 134.

2. Purely; innocently.

I will skip over it as clænly as I may, as men commonly do over bogs and quagmires.

Take-will on Providence, p. 103.

3. Dexterously; cleverly.

I will not poison thee with my attaint,

Nor fold my fault in clænly cou'd excuses.

Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

To have a quick hand, and convey things clænly.

Middleton's Witch, ii. 3.

CLEANNESS. † n. s. [Sax. clænneþe.]

1. Neatness; freedom from filth.

2. Easy exactness; justness; natural, unlaboured correctness.

He shewed no strength in shaking of his staff; but the fine cleanness of bearing it was delightful.

Sidney.

He minded only the clearness of his satyr, and the cleanness of expression.

Dryden, Juvenal.

3. Purity; innocence.

Marriage ought to be used with much honestie, cleanness, and sobernesse, after the godly example of Tobias and Sara.

Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 79. b.

The cleanness and purity of one's mind is never better proved than in discovering its own faults at first view.

Pope

CLEANABLE.* adj. [from cleans.] That which may be cleansed or purified. Sherwood.

To CLEANSE. v. a. [clenjan, Saxon.]

1. To free from filth or dirt, by washing or rubbing.
*Cleanse the pale corps with a religious hand,
From the polluting weed and common sand.* Prior.
2. To purify from guilt.
The blueness of a wound cleanseth away evil. Proverbs, xx. 30.

*Not all her odorous tears can cleanse her crime,
The plant alone deforms the happy clime.* Dryden.

3. To free from noxious humours by purgation.
*Can'st thou not minister to a mind diseas'd,
And with some sweet oblivious antidote,
Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff
Which weighs upon the heart?* Shakespeare.
This oil, combined with its own salt and sugar, makes it saponaceous and cleansing, by which quality it often helps digestion, and excites appetite. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. To free from leprosy.
Shew thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded. St. Mark, i. 44.

5. To scour; to rid of all offensive things.
This river the Jews proffered the Pope to cleanse, so they might have what they found. Addison or Italy.

CLEANSE. † n. s. [clænsepe, Sax.]

1. That which has the quality of evacuating any foul humours; or digesting a sore; a detergent.
If there happens an imposthume, honey, and even honey of roses, taken inwardly, is a good cleanser. Arbuthnot.
2. That which cleanses any thing. Sherwood.
His comb was the cleanser of his head. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iv. v.

CLEANING.* n. s. [Sax. clænning.] Purification.
And Neemias called this thing Naphthar; which is as much as to say, a cleansing. 2 Macc. i. 36.
Such as direct their humiliations and penitential cleansings only to some great actual sin. South, Sermon, vi. 462.

CLEAR. † adj. [old Fr. clère, mod. clair; Dutch, klar; Germ. klar; Welsh, clar; Lat. clarus; Gr. γλαυρός.]

1. Bright; transpicuous; pellucid; transparent; luminous; without opacity or cloudiness: not nebulous; not opacous; not dark. Wicliffe, for our present word gay, gives clear; meaning fine or splendid: "Him that is clothed with cleer clothing." St. James, ii. 3.

*The stream is so transparent, pure, and clear,
That had the self-enamour'd youth gaz'd here,
He but the bottom, not his face had seen.* Benham.
You may tilt the hogshend the next day, and in a fortnight get a dozen or two of good clear wine to dispose of as you please. Swift, Direct. to the Butler.

2. Perspicacious; sharp.
*Michael from Adam's eyes the film remov'd,
Which that false fruit that promis'd clearer sight
Had bred.* Milton, P. L.

*A tun about was ev'ry pillar there;
A polish'd mirrour shone not half so clear.* Dryden, Fables.

3. Cheerful; not clouded with care or anger.
*Sternly he pronounc'd
The rigid interdiction, which resounds
Yet dreadful in mine ear, though in my choice,
Not to incur; but soon his clear aspect

4. Free from clouds; serene.
I will darken the earth in a clear day. Amos, viii. 9.
*And the clear sun on his wide watery glass,

5. Without mixture; pure; unmingled. Dr. Johnson offers no example of this meaning, which indeed is not common. Wicliffe's translation of the N. T. gives this word for what is now rendered pure, i. e. sincere.

I write to you this second epistle, in which I stir your cleer soul by monishyng, &c. Wicliffe, 2 Pet. iii. 1.

6. Perspicuous; not obscure; not hard to be understood; not ambiguous.

Many men reason exceeding clear and rightly, who know not how to make a syllogism. Locke.

7. Indisputable; evident; undeniable.
*Remain'd to our almighty foe
Clear victory; to our part loss, and rout
Through all th' empyrean.* Milton, P. L.

8. Apparent; manifest; not hid; not dark.
*The hemisphere of earth in clearest ken,
Stretch'd out to the amplest reach of prospect lay.* Milton, P. L.

Unto God, who understandeth all their secret cogitations, they are clear and manifest. Hooker, iii. § 1.

The pleasure of right reasoning is still the greater, by how much the consequences are more clear, and the chains of them more long. Burnet, Theory.

9. Quick to understand; prompt; acute.
*Mother of science, now I feel thy power
Within me clear, not only to discern
Things in their causes, but to trace the ways
Of highest agents, deem'd however wise.* Milton, P. L.

10. Unspotted; guiltless; irreproachable.
Duncan has been so clear in his great office. Shakespeare.
*Think that the clearest gods, who make them honours
Of men's impossibilities, have preserv'd thee.* Shakespeare.
Repentance so altereth and changeth a man through the mercy of God, be he never so defiled, that it maketh him pure and clear. Whitgift.

Though the peripatetick philosophy has been most eminent in its way, yet other sects have not been wholly clear of it. Locke.

*Statesman, yet friend to truth, in soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear.* Pope.

11. Unprepossessed; not preoccupied; impartial.
Leucippe, of whom one look, in a clear judgment, would have been more acceptable than all her kindness, so prodigally bestowed. Sidney.

12. Free from distress, prosecution, or imputed guilt.
*The cruel corporal whisper'd in my ear,
Five pounds, if rightly tipt, would set me clear.* Gay.

13. Free from deductions or incumbrances.
Hope, if the success happens to fail, is clear gains, as long as it lasts. Collier against Despair.

Whatever a foreigner, who purchases land here, gives for it, is so much every farthing clear gain to the nation; for that money comes clear in, without carrying out any thing for it. Locke.

*I often wish'd that I had clear,
For life, six hundred pounds a-year.* Swift.

14. Unincumbered; without let or hindrance; vacant; unobstructed.

*If he be so far beyond his health,
M'thinks he should the sooner pay his debts,
And make a clear way to the gods.* Shakespeare.

The sums I have collected shall express. Shakespeare.

It seems to be in the power of a reasonable clergyman to make the most ignorant man comprehend

C L E

CLE'RICAL.† adj. [old Fr. clericat, from clericus, Lat.] Relating to the clergy: as, a clerical man; a man in orders.

I cannot subscribe to the counsel of Leonardus Lessius, that it were meet for clerical and religious persons rather to suffer death than to kill a murderer; since no reason can be shewed, why their life should not be as dear to them as others.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. ii. 1.

Sir P.P. having observed many to look with an evil eye on the clerical revenue, his lordship sent him in a letter the following paper.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 271.

CLE'RIK.* n. s. [Sax. clepic, Lat. clericus.] A clergyman.

What means the profession furnishes, the cleric who is the most intent upon its proper duties, the most addicted to a life of study and devotion, is the least qualified to improve.

Bp. Horsley, Sermon for Sons of the Clergy, (1786.)

CLE'RIK.* adj. Relating to the character of a clergyman.

CLERK.† n. s. [old Fr. clerc, scavant, instruit: and, for the clergy, clereux, clerkus; Sax. clepic; Lat. clericus.] Formerly clerk was the usual term for a scholar; most situations of trust or talent being filled by the clergy. See Blackstone's Comment, vol. i. Introduct. Thus clergie, in old French, is a general term for science.]

1. A clergyman.

All persons were stiled clerks that served in the church of Christ, whether they were bishops, priests, or deacons. Ayliffe.

2. A scholar; a man of letters.

4. A petty writer in publick offices: an officer of various kinds.

Take a just view, how many may remark Who's now a lord, his grand-sire was a clerk. Granville.

It may seem difficult to make out the bills of fare for the suppers of Vitellids. I question not but an expert clerk of a kitchen can do it. Arbutnot.

5. The layman who reads the responses to the congregation in the church, to direct the rest.

By the clerks in the rubrick of the Common-Prayer-Book, (which was first inserted in the second book of K. Edw. VI.) I suppose were meant such persons as were appointed, at the beginning of the Reformation, to attend the incumbent in his performance of the offices; and such are still in some cathedral and collegiate churches, which have lay-clerks to look out the lessons, name the anthem, set the psalms, and the like; of which sort I take our parish-clerks to be, though we have now seldom more than one to a church.

Wheatley on Comm. Pr. ii. § 17.

CLERK-ALE.* n. s. [from clerk and ale.] The feast of the parish clerk. See ALE.

Clerk-ale occurs in Aubrey's manuscript History of Wiltshire. "In the Easter holidays was the clarkes-ale for his private benefit and the solace of the neighbourhood."

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 129.

The perplex'd labyrinth we backward tread. Roscommon.

They see small clews draw vastest weights along,
Not in their bulk but in their order strong. Dryden.

2. A guide; a direction: because men direct themselves by a claw of thread in a labyrinth.

This alphabet must be your own claw to guide you. Holder.
Is there no way, no thought, no beam of light?

No claw to guide me thro' this gloomy maze,
To clear my honour, yet preserve my faith? Smith.

The reader knows not how to transport his thoughts over to the next particular, for want of some claw, or connecting idea, to lay hold of. Watts, Logick.

3. CLEW of the sail of a Ship, is the lower corner of it, which reaches down to that caring where the tackles and sheets are fastened. Harris.

To CLEW. v. a. [from claw, a sea-term.]

To claw the Sails, is to raise them, in order to be furled, which is done by a rope fastened to the claw of a sail, called the claw-garnet. Harris.

To CLEW. * v. a. [from the noun.] To direct; to guide as by a thread.

Direct and claw me out the way to happiness.

Beaum. and Fl. Women pleus'd.

To CLICK. † v. n. [cliken, Dut. cliquet, French; or perhaps the diminutive of clack; Dr. Johnson says. He might have added that the old Fr. cliquer and cliquer is to click.] To make a sharp, small, successive noise.

The solemn death-watch click'd, the hour she dy'd;
And shrilling crickets in the chimney cry'd. Gay.

To CLICK. * v. a. [Sax. gelacean, to snatch.] To catch or snatch hastily; yet used in the north of England.

CLICK. * n. s. [old Fr. clique, i. e. cliquet or cliquet. See CLICKET.] The latch of a door.

CLICKER. n. s. [from click.] A low word for the servant of a salesman, who stands at the door to invite customers.

CLICKET. † n. s. [old Fr. cliquet.]

1. The ring, knocker, or hammer of a door.

Cotgrave and Skinner.

2. Formerly, a key.

This fresh May of which I spake of yore,
In warm wax hath eprinted the cliket
That January bare of the snail wicket. Chancer, March. Tale.

CLIENT. † n. s. [Fr. client; Lat. cliens, cluo, from the Gr. κλύω, to hear.]

1. One who applies to an advocate for counsel and defence.

There is due from the judge to the advocate some commendation, where causes are well handled; for that upholds in the client the reputation of his counsel. Bacon, Ess.

Advocates must deal plainly with their clients, and tell the true state of their case. Ep. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

2. It may be perhaps sometimes used for a dependant in a more general sense, as it was used among the Romans.

I do think they are your friends and clients,
And fearful to disturb you. B. Jonson.

CLIENTAL. * adj. [from client.] Dependant.

In order to continue the cliental bond, and not to break up an old and strong confederacy and thereby disperse the tribe.

Burke, Abing. Eng. Hist. ii. 7.

CLIENTED. particip. adj. [from client.] Supplied with clients.

This due occasion of discouragement, the worst conditioned and least cliented petivoguers, do yet, under the sweet bait of revenge, convert to a more plentiful prosecution of actions.

Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

CLIENTELE. † n. s. [old Fr. clientele, Lat. clientela.]

The condition or office of a client. A word scarcely used, Dr. Johnson says, citing the authority only, of Ben Jonson. It is, however, repeatedly used by a better writer than the facetious bard.

Those of the Roman clientele are not more careful and punctual in scanning and observing the rules and practice of their espousals, than ours here are incurious in both.

Lp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv. 6.

There's Varus holds good quarters with him;

And, under the pretext of clientele,
Will be admitted. B. Jonson.

CLIENTSHIP. n. s. [from client.] The condition of a client.

Patronage and clientship among the Romans always descended: the plebeian houses had recourse to the patrician line which had formerly protected them. Dryden.

CLIFF. † n. s. [clivus, Lat. clip, chop, Saxon, part. cleofed from cleofan, to cleave; Icel. klínfa, the same; Goth. klifst, a segment. "In our ancient language, the cut-off or broken mountains on the sea-sides are more rightly and properly called cliffs, than by the name of rocks or hills; that appellation being more fitting unto the inland mountains; but the name of cliff, coming from our verb to cleave, is unto these more aptly given, for that they seem unto our view as clefft or cloven from the part that sometime belonged unto them. And albeit many cliffs are in many places of the sea-shore to be seen, as well as at Dover; yet are they not seen so to be answered, and corresponded unto by others right over against them." Verstegan, Restit. of Dec. Intell. ch. 4.]

1. A steep rock; a rock, according to Skinner, broken and craggy. [rups.]

The Leucadians did use to precipitate a man from a high cliff into the sea. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Mountaineers, that from Severus came,

And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica. Dryden.

Where-ever 'tis so found scattered upon the shores, there is it as constantly found lodged in the cliffs thereabouts.

Woodward.

2. The name of a character in musick. Properly CLEF. [Fr.]

A bird

Whom art had never taught cliffs, moods, or notes.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy.

Cliff is a mark in musick at the beginning of the lines of a song; and is the indication of the pitch, and bespeaks what kind of voice, as base, tenour, or treble, it is proper for.

Sir J. Hawkins.

CLIFFY. * adj. [from cliff.] Broken; craggy.

Calling them craggie or cliffie mountains, as being full of downe-falls and hollow places.

Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Sermon. (1587.) p. 301.

Beneath the shade of Vecta's cliffy isle. Dyer.

CLIFT. † n. s.

1. The same with CLIFF; now disused, Dr. Johnson says; and he notices only the usage of it by Spenser. It has, however, another meaning.

Down he tumbled, like an aged tree,

High growing on the top of rocky clift. Spenser, F. Q.

2. A crack; a fissure.

I will put thee in a clift of the rock. Erod. xxxiii. 24.

CLIFTED. * adj. [from clift.] Broken.

The swarming populace spread every wall,
And cling, as if with claws they did enforce
Their hold, thro' clifted stones, stretching and staring,
As if they were all eyes, and every limb
Would feed its faculty of admiration.

Congreve, Mourning Bride.

O nation, that thou couldst remove!
That Neptune's arms, who clippeth thee about.
Enter the city, clip your wives; your friends,
Tell them your feats. Shakspeare.

The jades
That drag the tragick melancholy night,
Who with their drowsy, slow, and flagging wings,
Clip dead men's graves. Shakspeare.

The oak's not envious of the sailing cedar,
The lusty vine not jealous of the ivy,
Because she clips the elm. Beaumont and Fletcher, Lover's Progress.

The male resteth on the back of the female, clipping and embracing her with his legs about the neck and body. Ray.
2. To cut with sheers. [klipper, Danish; klippen, Dutch; apparently from the same radical sense, since sheers cut by inclosing and embracing. The
Sax. clýpan also is to clip or cut.]

Your sheers come too late to clip the bird's wings, that already is flown away. Sidney.

Then let him, that my love shall blame,
Or clip love's wings, or quench love's flame. Suckling.

He clips hope's wings, whose airy bliss
Much higher than fruition is. Denham.

But love had clipp'd his wings, and cut him short,
Confin'd within the purlieus of his court. Dryden, Fables.

If mankind had had wings, as perhaps some extravagant atheist may think us deficient in that, all the world must have consented to clip them. Bentley.

By this lock, this sacred lock, I swear,
Which never more shall join its parted hair,
Clipp'd from the lovely head, where late it grew. Pope.

He spent every day ten hours dozing, clipping papers, or darning his stockings. Swift.

3. Sometimes with off.
We should then have as much feeling upon the clipping off a hair, as the cutting of a nerve. Bentley, Sermon.

4. It is particularly used of those who diminish coin, by paring the edges.

This design of new coinage, is just of the nature of clipping.
Locke.

5. To curtail; to cut short.

That they added, changed, or clipped any thing from the tenor of their commission.

Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Sermon. (1587,) p. 401.

All my reports go with the modest truth,
Nor more, nor clipt, but so. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Mrs. Mayoress clipp'd the king's English. Addison, Spect.

Even in London, they clip their words after one manner about the court, another in the city, and a third in the suburbs. Swift.

6. To confine; to hold; to contain.

Where is he living, clipt in with the sea,
Who calls me pupil? Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

To CLIP. v. n. A phrase in falconry.

Some falcon stoops at what her eye design'd,
And with her eagerness the quarry miss'd,
Straight flies at check, and clips it down the wind. Dryden.

CLIP.* n. s. [from the verb.] An embrace.

Finding these northern climes do coldly him embrace,
Not us'd to frozen clips, he strave to find some part,
Where with most ease and warmth he might employ his art.
Sidney, Astrophel and Stella.

CLIPPER.† n. s. [from clip.]

1. One that debases coin by cutting.

It is no English treason to cut
French crowns, and to-morrow the king
Unus'd will be a clipper. Shakspeare.

No coins pleased some medallists more than those which had pass'd through the hands of an old Roman clipper. Addison.

2. A barber. Huot.

CLIPPING. n. s. [from clip.] The part cut or clipped off.

Beings purely material, without sense or thought, as the clippings of our beards, and parings of our nails. Locke.

To CLISH-CLASH.* v. n. [A reduplication of clash, in imitation of the sound. See To CLASH.] To sound like the clashing of swords.

The weapons clish-clash. Mirror for Magistrates, p. 481.
CLIVER. n. s. An herb. More properly written cleaver.

It grows wild, the seeds sticking to the clothes of such as pass by them. It is sometimes used in medicine. Miller.

CLOAK. n. s. [lach, Saxon.]

1. The outer garment, with which the rest are covered.

You may hear it,
Under a cloak that is of any length. Shakspeare.

Their cloaks were cloath of silver, mix'd with gold. Dryden.

All arguments will be as little able to prevail, as the wind did with the traveller to part with his cloak, which he held only the faster. Locke.

Nimble he rose, and cast his garment down;
That instant in his cloak I wrapt me round. Pope, Odyssey.

2. A concealment; a cover.

Not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness.

1 Peter, ii. 16.

To CLOAK.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover with a cloak.

2. To hide; to conceal.

Most heavenly fair, in deed and view,

She by creation was, till she did fall;

Thenceforth she sought for helps to cloak her crimes withal.

Spenser, F. Q.

Neither let incest be coloured or covered with the cloaked pretense of matrimonic.

Martin, Marr. of Priests, (1554,) ch. 16.

The most deisto and barbarous,

Believe it, the most void of all humanity,

Howe'r his cunning cloak it to his uncle.

Bentley, and Fl. Four Plays in One.

CLOAKBAG. n. s. [from cloak and bag.] A portmanteau; a bag in which clothes are carried.

Why do'st thou converse with that trunk of humours, that stuffed cloakbag of guts? Shakspeare.

I have already fit
('Tis in my cloakbag) doublet, hat, hose, all

That answer to them. Shakspeare.

CLOCHARD.* n. s. [Fr. cloche, a bell; clocher, to ring a bell. V. Diet. Languedoc.] A bellry.

King Edward the Third built, in the little sanctuary, a clochard of stone and timber; and placed therein three bells for the use of St. Stephen's chapel.

Weever, Fun. Mon. p. 491.

CLOAKEDLY.* adv. [from the verb.] In a disguised or concealed manner.

The French ambassador came to declare, first how the em-perour wronged divers of his master's subjects and vassals;
arrested also his merchants, and did cloakedly begin war.

K. Edward VI. Journal, Burnet's Hist. Ref. ii.

CLOCK.† n. s. [cloce, Welsh, from clôch, a bell,
Welsh and Armorick; cloche, French; cluega,
Sax.]

1. The instrument which, by a series of mechanical movements, tells the hour by a stroke upon a bell.

If a man be in sickness or pain, the time will seem longer without a clock or hour-glass than with it. Bacon.

The picture of Jerome usually described at his study, is with a clock hanging by. Brown, Vulg. Err.

I told the clocks, and watch'd the wasting light. Dryden.

2. It is an usual expression to say, What is it of the clock, for What hour is it? Or ten o'clock, for the tenth hour.

What is't o'clock? —

— Upon the stroke of four. Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

Maricans set forward about ten o'clock in the night.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

About nine of the clock at night the king marched out of the North-port. Clarendon, b. viii.

His stockings with silver clocks were ravished from him.

Swift.

4. An insect; a sort of beetle.

Dict.

5. The sound which the hen makes in calling her chickens. See To CLOCK.

To CLOCK.* v. a. [Sax. cloccan; Teut. klocken; old Fr. cloncloquer; Lat. glocio.] To call, as the hen calls her chickens. See To CLUCK.

So long doth the great brood-hen clock her chickens, as she takes them to be her's.

Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Garnet, Ff. 4. b.

To CLOCK.* v. n. To make a noise like the hen.

That eggs were made before the hardy cock

Began to tread, or brooding hen to clock.

The Silkworms, 1599.

CLOCKMAKER. n. s. [clock and maker.] An artificer whose profession is to make clocks.

This inequality has been diligently observed by several of our ingenious clockmakers, and equations been made and used by them. Derham.

CLOCKSETTER.* n. s. [from clock and set.] One who regulates the clock.

Old time the clocksetter, that bald sexton time.

Shakespeare, K. John.

CLOCKWORK. n. s. [clock and work.] Movements by weights or springs, like those of a clock.

So if unprejudic'd you scan

The goings of this clockwork, man;

You find a hundred movements made

By fine devices in his head:

But 'tis the stomach's solid stroke,

That tells this being, what's o'clock.

Prior.

Within this hollow was Vulcan's shop, full of fire and clockwork. Addison, Guardian.

You look like a puppet moved by clockwork. Arbutnot.

CLOD. n. s. [clad, Sax. a little hillock; klotte, Dutch.]

1. A lump of earth or clay; such a body of earth as cleaves or hangs together.

The earth that casteth up from the plough a great clod, is not so good as that which casteth up a smaller clod. Bacon.

I'll cut up, as plows

Do barren lands, and strike together flints

And clods, the ungrateful senate and the people. B. Jonson.

Who smooths with harrows, or who pounds with rakes

The crumbling clods. Dryden.

2. A turf; the ground.

Byzantians boast, that on the clod,

Where once their sultan's horse has trod,

Grows neither grass, nor shrub, nor tree.

Swift.

3. Any thing concreted together in a cluster.

Fishermen, who make holes in the ice to dip up fish with their nets, light on swallows congealed in clods of a slimy substance, and carrying them home to their stoves, the warmth restoreth them to life and flight. Carew.

4. A lump; a mass of metal.

One at the forge

Labouring, two massy clods of iron and brass

Had melted.

Milton, P. L.

5. Any thing vile, base, and earthy; as the body of man, compared to his soul.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,

In which a thousand torches, flaming bright,

Do burn, that to us wretched earthly clods,

In dreadful darkness, lend desired light. Spenser, Epithal.

The spirit of man,

Which God inspir'd, cannot together perish

With this corporeal clod.

Milton, P. L.

How the purer spirit is united to this clod, is a knot too hard for our degraded intellects to untie. Glanville.

In moral reflections there must be heat as well as dry reason, to inspire this cold clod of clay, which we carry about with us.

Burnet, Theory.

6. A dull, gross, stupid fellow; a dolt.

The vulgar! a scarce animated clod,

Ne'er pleas'd with aught above 'em.

Dryden.

To CLOD. v. n. [from the noun.] To gather into concretions; to coagulate: for this we sometimes use clod.

Let us go find the body, and from the stream,
With lavers pure, and cleansing herbs, wash off
The clotted gore.

Milton, S. A.

To CLOD. v. a. [from the noun.] To pelt with clods.

CLODDY.* adj. [Sax. cludig.]

1. Consisting of earth or clods; earthy; muddy; miry; mean; gross; base.

The glorious sun,

Turning, with splendour of his precious eye,

The meagre cloddy earth to glittering gold;

Shakespeare.

2. Full of clod, unbroken.

These lands they sow always under furrow about Michaelmas, and leave it as cloddy as they can. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CLOD-HOPPER. See CLODPOLE.

CLODDATE. n. s. [clod and pate.] A stupid fellow; a dolt; a thick skull.

CLODDATED. adj. [from clodpate.] Stupid; dull; doltish; thoughtless.

My clodpated relations spoiled the greatest genius in the world, when they bred me a mechanic. Arbutnot.

CLODPOLE.* n. s. [from clod and poll.] A thick-skull; a dolt; a blockhead. Formerly written also clodpoll, which see. The modern vulgarism is clod-hopper.

This letter being so excellently ignorant, he will find that it comes from a clodpoll. Shakespeare.

O! your parasite

Is a most precious thing, dropt from above,

Not bred 'mongst clods and clodpols here on earth.

B. Jonson, For.

To CLOG.* v. a. [It is imagined by Skinner to come from log: by Casaubon derived from κλῶς, a dog's collar, being thought to be first hung upon fierce dogs. The Sax. clæg, clayey, and the Dan. klæg, might also be offered. But Mr. Chalmers adduces the Welsh clag, a stone; used as a stone.]

1. To load with something that may hinder motion; to cumber with shackles: to impede, by fastening to the neck or leg a heavy piece of wood or iron.

If you find so much blood in his liver as will clog the foot of a flea, I'll eat the root of the anatomy. Shakespeare.

Let a man wear himself from these worldly impediments, that here clog his soul's flight. Digby on the Soul.

The wings of birds were clogg'd with ice and snow. Dryden.

Fleshy lusts do debase men's minds, and clog their spirits, make them gross and foul, listless and inactive. Tillotson.

Guns and pomtums shall his flight restrain,

While clogg'd he beats his silken wings in vain. Pope.

2. To hinder; to obstruct.

The gutted rocks and congregate sands,

Traitors castep'd to clog the guiltless keel. Shakespeare.

His majesty's ships were over-pestered and clogged with great ordnance, whereof there is superfluity. Raleigh, Ess.

3. To load; to burthen; to epibarrass.

Since thou hast far to go, bear not along

The clogging burthen of a guilty soul

Shakespeare.

You'll rue the time

That clogs me with this answer.

Shakespeare.

They lanc'd a vein, and watch'd returning breath;

It came, but clogg'd with symptoms of his death. Dryden.

All the commodities are clogged with impositions. Addison.

I discovered no way to keep our thoughts close to their business, but by frequent attention getting the habit of attention.

Lacke.

I thus neglecting worldly ends, all dedicated

To closeness, and the bettering of my mind.

Shakespeare.

6. Secrecy; privacy.

To his confederates he was constant and just, but not open. Such was his enquiry, and such his closeness, as they stood in the light towards him, and he stood in the dark towards them.

Bacon, Henry VII.

A journey of much adventure had been not communicated with any of his majesty's counsellors, being carried with great closeness, like a business of love than state.

Wotton.

We rise not against the piercing judgment of Augustus, nor the extreme caution or closeness of Tiberius.

Bacon, Ess.

This prince was so very reserved, that he would impart his secrets to no body: whereupon this closeness did a little perish his understanding.

Collier of Friendship.

7. Covetousness; sly avarice.

Thus judg'd, that while he could keep his poverty a secret, he should not feel it: he improved this thought into an affectation of closeness and covetousness.

Addison, Spect.

8. Connection; dependance.

The actions and proceedings of wise men run in greater closeness and coherence with one another, than thus to drive at a casual issue, brought under no forecast or design.

South.

CLOSE.† n. s. [from close.] A finisher; a concluder; "a strengthener; a settler; a fastener;" Cotgrave. A boot-closer, one who closes the legs of boots, is in London the name of a workman distinct from the cordwainer.

Sliddering through clotter'd blood and holy mire. Dryd. Aen.

CLO'TTRY. adj. [from clot.] Full of clots; concreted; full of concretions.

The matter expectorated is thin, and mixed with thick, clotty, bluish streaks. Harvey on Consumptions.

Where land is clotty, and a shower of rain soaks through, you may make use of a roll to break it. Mortimer.

CLOUD.† n. s. [The derivation is not known.]

Minshew derives it from claulo, to shut; Somner from clod; Casaubon from αχλὺς, darkness; Skinner from kladde, Dutch, a spot. So far Dr. Johnson. To these may be added Junius, who derives it from the Gr. κλύδων, a wave, because of the resemblance of a cloud to a wave. Serenius cites the old Goth. gläte, a clear vapour; and laud, moisture. But Mr. H. Tooke thinks it is the Sax.

participle ge-hlob, covered; the word being thus formed, gehloud, gloud, cloud.]

1. The dark collection of vapours in the air.

Now are the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.
As a mist is a multitude of small but solid globules, which therefore descend; so a vapour, and therefore a watry cloud, is nothing else but a congeries of very small and concave globules, which therefore ascend, to that height in which they are of equal weight with the air, where they remain suspended, 'till, by some motion in the air, being broken, they descend in solid drops; either small, as in a mist, or bigger, when many of them run together, as in rain. Grew's Cosmol.

Clouds are the greatest and most considerable of all the meteors, as furnishing water and plenty to the earth. They consist of very small drops of water, and are elevated a good distance above the surface of the earth; for a cloud is nothing but a mist flying high in the air, as a mist is nothing but a cloud here below. Locke, Elem. Nat. Philos.

How vapours, turn'd to clouds, obscure the sky;

And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply. Roscommon.

The dawn is overcast, the morning low'rs,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day. Addison.

2. The veins, marks, or stains in stones, or other bodies.

3. Any state of obscurity or darkness.

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude, &c. Milton, Sonn. xvi.

Though poets may of inspiration boast,
Their rage, ill govern'd, in the clouds is lost. Waller.

The bishop of London did cut down a noble cloud of trees at Fulham: the lord chancellor told him that he was "a good expounder of dark places."

Aubrey, Relat. of Id. Bacon's Apophthegms.

How can I see the brave and young,
Fall in the cloud of war, and fall unsung? Addison.

4. Any thing that spreads wide; as a croud, a multitude.

The objection comes to no more than this, that amongst a cloud of witnesses, there was one of no very good reputation. Atterbury.

To CLOUD.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To darken with clouds; to cover with clouds; to obscure.

2. To make of sullen and gloomy appearance.

Be not dishearten'd then, nor cloud those looks,
That wont to be more cheerful and serene. Milton, P. L.

What sullen fury clouds his scornful brow? Pope, Statius.

3. To obscure; to make less evident.

If men would not exhale vapours to cloud and darken the clearest truths, no man could miss his way to heaven for want of light. Decay of Piety.

4. To variegate with dark veins.

The handle smooth and plain
Made of the clouded olive's easy grain. Pope, Odyssey.

5. To sully; to defame.

I would not be a stander-by to hear
My sovereign mistress clouded so. Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

To CLOUD.† v. n. To grow cloudy; to grow dark with clouds.

'[Her] beams upon his hairless face are fix'd,
As if from thence they borrow'd all their shine:
Were never four such lamps together mix'd,
Had not his clouded with his brows' repine;
But her's, which through the crystal tears gave light,
Shone like the moon, in water seen by night.

Shakspeare, Ven. and Adonis.

CLO'UDBERRY. n. s. [from cloud and berry; chamæ-morus.] The name of a plant, called also knotberry.

Miller.

Cloud-ascending Lebanon.

Sandys, Ps. 92.

C L O

CLO'UDBORN.* adj. [from cloud and born.] Born of a cloud.

Like cloud-born centaurs, from the mountain's height
With rapid course descending to the fight,
They rush along; the rattling woods give way;
The branches bend before the sweepy sway.

Dryden, Virg. Æn. 7.

CLO'UDCAPT. adj. [from cloud and cap.] Topped with clouds; touching the clouds.

The cloudcapt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve.

Shakespeare.

CLO'UDCOMPELLING.* adj. [A word formed in imitation of νεφεληγεγενης, ill understood.]

1. An epithet of Jupiter, by whom clouds were supposed to be collected.

Health to both kings, attended with a roar
Of cannons, echo'd from the affrighted shore;
With loud resemblance of his thunder, prove
Bacchus the seed of cloudcompelling Jove.

Waller.

Supplicating move

Thy just complaint to cloudcompelling Jove.

Dryden.

2. Simply, collecting clouds.

Abyssinia's cloud-compelling cliffs.

Thomson, Autumn.

CLO'UDCOVERED.* adj. [from cloud, and cover.]

Wrapt in clouds.

At length we gain

A steep cloud-kissing rock, whose horned crowne
With proud imperial look beholds the maine.

Mir. for Mag. p. 65c.

CLO'UDTOPT.* adj. [from cloud and top.] Having the top covered with clouds.

Mountains, ye mourn in vain

Modred, whose magick song

Made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-topt head.

Gray, The Bard.

CLO'UDTOUCHING.* adj. [from cloud and touch.]

Ascending, as it were, to the clouds.

Cloud-touching mountains to new seats are borne

From their foundations, by his fury torne.

Sandys, Job. p. 14.

Propt by thy hand,

Cloud-touching mountains stedfast stand.

Sandys, Ps. p. 101.

CLO'UDILY. adv. [from cloudily.]

1. With clouds; darkly.

2. Obscurely; not perspicuously.

Some had rather have good discipline delivered plainly, by way of precepts, than cloudily enwrapped in allegories.

Spenser, on Ireland.

He was commanded to write so cloudily by Cornutus.

Dryden.

CLO'UDINESS. n. s. [from cloudy.]

1. The state of being covered with clouds; darkness.

You have such a February face,

So full of frost, of storm and cloudiness.

Shakespeare.

The situation of this island exposes it to a continual cloudiness, which in the summer renders the air colder, and in the winter warm.

Harvey on Consumptions.

C L O

2. Want of brightness.

I saw a cloudy Hungarian diamond made clearer by lying in a cold liquor; wherein, he affirmed, that upon keeping it longer, the stone would lose more of its cloudiness.

Boyle.

CLO'UBLESS.* adj. [from cloud.] Without clouds; clear; unclouded; bright; luminous; lightsome; pure; undarkened.

As the morning light,

The cloudless morning, so should be thine house.

Peele, David and Bethsabe, 1599.

This Partridge soon shall view in cloudless skies,

When next he looks thro' Galileo's eyes.

Pope.

How many such there must be in the vast extent of space, a naked eye in a cloudless night may give us some faint glimpse.

Cheyne, Phil. Princ.

CLO'UDY.* adj. [from cloud.]

1. Covered with clouds; obscured with clouds; consisting of clouds.

As Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door.

Exodus, xxxiii. 9.

At last his sail-broad vans

He spreads for flight, and in the surging smoke

Uplifted spurns the ground; thence many a league,

As in a cloudy chair, ascending rides.

Milton, P. L.

2. Dark; obscure; not intelligible.

Is you content yourself frequently with words instead of ideas, or with cloudy and confused notions of things, how impenetrable will that darkness be?

Watts on the Mind.

3. Gloomy of look, not open, nor cheerful.

So my storm-beaten heart likewise is cheer'd

With that sun-shine, when cloudy looks are clear'd.

Spenser.

Witness my son, now in the shade of death,

Whose bright outshining beams thy cloudy wrath

Hath in eternal darkness folded up.

Shakespeare.

4. Marked with spots or veins.

5. Not bright; wanting lustre, or clearness.

I saw a cloudy diamond.

Before the wine grows cloudy, shake the hogshead, and carry a glass of it to your master.

Swift, Direct. to the Butler.

CLOVE. the preterite of cleave. See TO CLEAVE.

Gyon's angry blade so fierce did clay

On the other's helmet, which as Titan shone,

That quite it clove his plumed crest in tway.

Spenser, F. Q.

CLOVE.* n. s. [clou, Fr. a nail, from the similitude of a clove to a nail, Dr. Johnson says; but it is perhaps from the Sax. clupe.]

1. A valuable spice brought from Ternate in the East Indies. It is the fruit or seed of a very large tree.

Clove seems to be the rudiment or beginning of a fruit growing upon clove-trees.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Some of the parts into which garlick separates, when the outer skin is torn off. [In this sense it is derived from clove, the preterite of cleave.]

'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour;

Each clove of garlick is a sacred pow'r.

Tate's Funeral.

CLOVE-GILLIA FLOWER. n. s. [from its smelling like cloves.]

This genus may be divided into three classes:

1. The clove-gillyflower, or carnation. 2. The pink. 3. The sweet William.

The carnation, or clove-gillyflower, are distinguished into four classes.

The first, called flakes, having two colours only, and their stripes large, going quite through the leaves.

The second, called bizars, have flowers striped, or variegated with three or four different colours.

The third are piquetts: these flowers have always a white ground, and are spotted with scarlet, red, purple, or other colours.

The fourth are called painted ladies: these have their petals of a red or purple colour on the upper side, and are white underneath. Of each of these classes there are numerous varieties. The true clove-gilly-flower has been long in use for making a cordial syrup. There are two or three varieties commonly brought to the markets, which differ greatly in goodness; some having very little scent, when compared with the true sort. Miller.

C L O

CLOVEN.† part. pret. [from cleave. Sax. clopen.] See To CLEAVE.

There is Anfidius, list you what work he makes Among your cloven army. Shakspeare.

Now, heap'd high,
The cloven oaks and lofty pines do lie. Waller.

A chap-fallen beaver, loosely hanging by
The cloven helm, and arch of victory. Dryden.

CLOVEN-FOOT.* adj. [Sax. clifen-foete.] Relating to a foot divided into two parts. See CLOVEN-FOOTED.

I think there are two more trusty characters to distinguish the apparition of an evil from a good angel, than the cloven-foot vulgar opinion affixeth to the devil.

Spencer on Prodiges, p. 231.

CLOVEN-FOOTED. } adj. [cloven and foot, or hoof.]
CLOVEN-HOOFED. } Having the foot divided into two parts; not a round hoof; bisulcous.

There are the bis ulcous or cloven-hoof; as camels and beavers. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Great variety of water fowl, both whole and cloven-footed, frequent the waters. Ray on the Creation.

CLOVER. } n. s. [more properly claver,
CLOVER-FLOWER.* } clapen, Sax. klaver, Dutch.
CLOVER-GRASS. } See CLAYER. The Sax. exhibits also clýpen. The word is, no doubt, from the verb clepan, to cleave, from the appearance of the cleaved leaves.]

1. A species of trefoil.

The even mead, that erst brought sweetly forth
The freckled cowslip, burnet, and green clover. Shakspeare.
Nature shall provide

Green grass and fatt'ning clover for their fare. Dryden, Virg.
Clover improves land, by the great quantity of cattle it maintains. Mortimer's Husbandry.

The crow-flower, and thereby the clover-flower they stick. Drayton, Polyolt. S. 15.

My Blouzelinda is the blithest lass,
Than primrose sweeter, or the clor-r-grass. Gay.

2. To live in CLOVER, is to live luxuriously; clover being extremely delicious and fattening to cattle.
Well, Laurent, was the night in clover spent. Ogle.

CLOVERED.† adj. [from clover.] Covered with clover.

Flocks thick-nibbling thro' the clover'd vale. Thomson, Summer.

Through the deep groves I hear the chaunting birds,
And through the clover'd vale the various lowing herds. T. Warton, Ode 8.

CLOUGH.† n. s. [clough, Saxon; cloiche, Irish, a rock.] The cleft of a hill; a cliff. In composition a hilly place, Dr. Johnson says. In Northumberland, it means a valley between two hills; a narrow glen. The old Norm. or Fr. clough is a valley, whence perhaps the introduction of the word into Domesday Book.

A clough, or clough, is a kind of breach or valley down a slope from the side of a hill.

Ferstegan, Restit. of Decayed Intell. ch. 9.

CLOUGH. n. s. [in commerce.] An allowance of two pounds in every hundred weight for the turn of the

C L O

Where late the diadem stood. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

In power of spittle and a clout,
When-e'er he please to blit it out. Swift.

2. A patch on a shoe or coat.

No man putteth a clout of boistous cloth into an olde clothing, for it doith away the fulnesse of the cloth, and a worse brekyng is made. Wicliffe, St. Matt. ix.

3. Anciently, the mark of white cloth at which archers shot.

He drew a good bow: he shot a fine shoot: he would have clapt in there clout at twelve score. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. II.

4. An iron plate to keep an axle-tree from wearing.

5. A blow; as, a clout on the ear: a vulgarism. But see To CLOUT.

To CLOUT.† v. a. [from the noun. "To sette peeces to a thyng, or clowten." Prompt. Parv. To clout boots or shoes, is to strengthen them with clout or hob-nails, old Fr. clou, clouët, a little nail; and sometimes with a thin plate of iron, called a clout.]

1. To patch; to mend coarsely.

Can you clout me a payre of botes? —
I wolde have them well underlayed, and easily,
For I use alwaye to goe on the one side.

Old Morality of Hycke Scorne.

Wynchester, when he either preacheth or disputeth, how he clouteth the old broken holes with patches of papistry.

Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 98. b

I thought he slept, and put
My clouted brogues from off my feet, whose rudeness
Answer'd my steps too loud. Shakspeare, Cymb.

The dull swain
Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon. Milton, Com.

corruptly used for clotted.
With flaws, and clouted cream, and country dainties stored. Drayton, Polyolt. S. 14.

I've seen her skim the clouted cream,
And press from spongy curds the milky stream. Gay.

CLOUTERLY.† adj. [probably by corruption from louterly, Dr. Johnson says. But it is rather from the Teut. klote, a stupid fellow.] Clumsy; awkward: as, a clouterly fellow.

The single wheel plough is a very clouterly sort.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

Let us observe Spenser with all his rusty, obsolete words; with all his rough-hewn, clouterly verses; yet take him throughout, and we shall find in him a graceful and poetick majesty. Phillips, Theatr. Poet. 1675, Pref.

C L O

CLOWN.† n. s. [imagined by Skinner and Junius to be contracted from colonus. It seems rather a Saxon word, corrupted from loæn; loen, Dutch, a word nearly of the same import. Lye, in his additions to Junius, deduces it from the Cimbr. luin, idle, stupid, slow. Serapius proposes the old Goth. klunnalær, rude, and hlenne, a slave.]

1. A rustick; a country fellow; a churl.

He came with all his clowns, horst upon cart-jades. Sidney.
The clowns, a boisterous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
With furious haste to the loud summons flew. Dryden.

2. A coarse ill-bred man.

In youth a coxcomb, and in age a clown. Spectator.
A country squire, represented with no other vice but that of being a clown, and having the provincial accent. Swift.

3. Formerly, a domestick fool, or licensed jester; an eccentrick character in the old mysteries and moralities; the buffoon of the morris dance; the fool in the ancient exhibitions; or dumb shews, at fairs; and thence perhaps, in modern times, the laughter-stirring clumsy mimick in our pantomimes.

To CLOWN.* v. n. To affect the behaviour of a clown.

Beshrew me, he clowns it properly indeed.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

CLOWNAGE.* n. s. [from clown.] The behaviour of a clown.

And he to serve me thus! ingratitude,
Beyond the coarseness yet of any clownage
Shewn to a lady! B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.

CLOWNERY.† n. s. [from clown.] Ill-breeding; churlishness; rudeness; brutality.

That's a court indeed,

Not mix'd with clowneries us'd in common houses.

Chapman's Ruyss D'Ambous.

The fool's conceit had both clownery and ill-nature.

L'Estrange.

CLOWNISH.† adj. [from clown.]

1. Consisting of rusticks or clowns; relating to them.

I come not to eat with ye, and to surfeit
In these poor clownish pleasures. Beaumont and Fl. The Prophetess.
Young Silvia beats her breast, and cries aloud
For succour from the clownish neighbourhood. Dryden.

2. Coarse; rough; rugged.

But with his clownish hands their tender wings
He brusheth oft. Spenser, P. Q. i. i. 23.

3. Uncivil; ill-bred; ill-mannered.

What if we essay'd to steal

The clownish fool out of your father's court? Shakspeare.

4. Clumsy; ungainly.

There was amongst his nearest attendants, one Henry Cuffe, a man of secret ambitious ends of his own, and of proportionate counsels smothered under the habit of a scholar, and slubbered over with a certain rude and clownish fashion, that had the semblance of integrity. Wotton, Parallel, &c.

With a grave look, in this odd equipage,
The clownish mimick traverses the stage. Prior.

CLOWNISHLY.† adv. [from clownish.] Coarsely; rudely; brutally.

CLOWNISHNESS.† n. s. [from clownish.]

1. Rusticity; coarseness; unpolished rudeness.

Even his Dorick dialect has an incomparable sweetness in its clownishness. Dryden.

If the boy should not make legs very gracefully, a dancing master will cure that defect, and wipe off that plainness which the a-la-mode people call clownishness. Locke.

2. Incivility; brutality.

'Tis clownishness, they say, to reject any,
And folly too. Fanshawe, Past. Fid. i. 2.

CLOWN'S MUSTARD. n. s. An herb. Dict.

To CLOY.† v. a. [enclouer, Fr. from the Lat. claudere, to shut, i. e. so to fill, as that there is no place left for any more. To cloy with pleasure, is common; but to cloy with woe, not so. Yet Milton uses the latter expression.] To nail up; to stop up.

1. To satiate; to sate; to fill beyond desire; to surfeit; to fill to loathing.

The length of those speeches had not cloyed Pyrocles, though he were very impatient of long deliberations. Sidney.

The very creed of Athanasius, and that sacred hymn of glory, are reckoned as superfluities, which we must in any case pare away, lest we cloy God with too much service. Hooker, v. § 42.

Who can cloy the hungry edge of appetite,
By bare imagination of a feast! Shakspeare.

For cloy'd with woes and trouble store,
Surcharg'd my soul doth lie. Milton, P. s. lxxxviii.

Continually varying the same sense, and taking up what he had more than enough inculcated before, he sometimes cloy's his readers instead of satisfying them. Dryden.

Whose little store her well taught mind does please,
Nor pinch'd with want, nor cloy'd with wanton ease.

Roscommon.

Intemperance in eating and drinking, instead of delighting and satisfying nature, doth but load and cloy it. Tillotson.

Settle, cloy'd with custard and with praise,
Is gather'd to the dull of ancient days. Pope.

2. It seems to have, in the following passage, another sense: perhaps to strike the beak together, Dr. Johnson says. But it means to claw the beak, an accustomed action, Mr. Steevens says, with hawks and eagles. Cloy is used for cloy, which, as well as clee, in our old language, is the same as claw. See CLEES.

His royal bird

Prunes the immortal wing, and cloys his beak,
As when his god is pleas'd. Shakspeare.

3. To nail up guns, by striking a spike into the touch-hole. It is also a term used among farriers, when a horse is pricked with a nail in shoeing. Kersey. [old Fr. cloier, to prick.] To the latter of these senses may be referred the following passage in Spenser.

That foe of his, [the boar,]

Which with his cruel tusks him deadly cloy'd.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. vi. 48.

CLOYLESS. adj. [from cloy.] That of which too much cannot be had; that which cannot cause satiety.

Epicurean cooks

Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite. Shakspeare.

CLOYMENT. n. s. [from cloy.] Satiety; repletion beyond appetite.

Alas! their love may be call'd appetite:

No motion of the liver, but the palate,
That suffers surfeit, cloyment, and revolt. Shakspeare.

CLUB.† n. s. [ckeppa, Welsh; kluppel, Dutch.]

1. A heavy stick: a staff intended for offence.

He strove his combed club to quit
Out of the earth. Spenser, F. Q.

As he pulled off his helmet, a butcher slew him with the stroke of a club. Haguard.

Arm'd with a knotty club another came. Dryden.

2. The name of one of the suits of cards.

The club, black tyrant first her victim died,
Spite of his haughty mien and barba'rous pride. Pope.

3. [From cleopan, to divide. Skinner.] The shot or dividend of a reckoning, paid by the company in just proportions.

A fuddling couple sold ale: their humour was to drink drunk, upon their own liquor: they laid down their club, and this they called forcing a trade. L'Estrange.

4. An assembly of good fellows, meeting under certain conditions, Dr. Johnson says; and he cites, in proof of this, only the example from Dryden; in which factionous clubs, however, can hardly be said to consist of good fellows. Nor is club of so confined a meaning as Dr. Johnson represents. For, under the adjective good, he describes "good fellows as companionable, sociable, merry fellows;" such, we may suppose as Goldsmith's "club of choice spirits" consisted of, and not as members of the "humdrum club, where a man might sit in silence," Goldsmith's Ess. 4. In short, a club is not always an "assembly of good fellows" in Dr. Johnson's meaning; but an association of persons subjected to particular rules.

What right has any man to meet in factionous clubs to vilify the government? Dryden's Medal, Dedication.

The end of our club is to advance conversation and friendship, and to reward deserved persons with our interest and our recommendations. We admit none but men of wit and interest. Swift, Letters.

This club of duellists, consisting only of men of honour, did not continue long, most of the members of it being put to the sword, or hanged, soon after its institution. Spectator, No. 9.

The club of ugly faces was instituted originally at Cambridge, in the merry reign of Charles II. Spect. No. 78.

Soon after his [Johnson's] return to London, which was in February 1764, was founded that club which existed long without a name, but at Mr. Garrick's funeral became distinguished by the title of THE LITERARY CLUB.

Boswell, Life of Johnson.

5. Concurrence; contribution; joint charge.

He's bound to vouch them for his own,

Though got by implicate generation,

And general club of all the nation.

Hudibras.

6. An old term for a booby. Grose's Glossary, under Hertfordshire clubs and clouted shoon. See also CLUBBISH.

To CLUB.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To contribute to a common expence in settled proportions.

This — was in a less proportion than what was paid by the inhabitants, who were chiefly concerned to pay for their own case: I should not, my lord, be against the parson's continuing to club with them. Bp. Nicholson to the E. of Thanet, 1706.

2. To join to one effect; to contribute separate powers to one end.

'Till grosser atoms, tumbling in the stream
Of fancy, madly met, and clubb'd into a dream. Dryden.

Every part of the body seems to club and contribute to the seed, else why should parents, born blind or deaf, sometimes generate children with the same imperfections? Ray.

Let sugar, wine, and cream together club,

To make that gentle viand, syllabub.

King.

The owl, the raven, and the bat,

Clubb'd for a feather to his hat.

Swift.

To CLUB. v. a. To pay to a common reckoning.

Plums and directors, Shylock and his wife,

Will club their testers now to take your life.

Pope.

Fibres being distinct, and impregnated by distinct spirits, how should they club their particular informations into a common idea? Collier on Thought.

CLUBBED.* adj. [from club.] Heavy, like a club.

When I bete my knaves,

She bringeth me the grete clubbed staves.

Chaucer, Monkes Tale, Prol.

CLUBBER.* n. s. See CLUBBIST.

CLUBBISH.* adj. [from club.] An old adjective for clownish. Sherwood.] Rustick.

The highest trees be soonest blown downe:

Ten kings do die before one clubbish clowne.

Mir. for Mag. p. 231.

I indeed dialle the clubbish train.

Ibid. p. 474.

CLUBBIST.* n. s. [from club.] He who belongs to a particular association. The word is modern; it was formerly a clubber, forgotten and disused; as in Characters annexed to two Essays on Love and Marriage, 1657.

The difference between the clubbists and the old adherents to the monarchy of this country is hardly worth a scuffle.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

CLUBFIST.* n. s. [from club and fist.] A large fist; applied contemptuously to persons.

The rascall rude, the rogue, the clubfist gript

My slender arme, and pluckt me on in hast.

Mir. for Mag. p. 40.

CLUBFISTED.* adj. [from clubfist.] Having a large fist.

As Logick is clubfisted and crabbed, so she is terrible at first sight.

Howell's Lett. i. v. 9.

CLUBFOOTED.* adj. [from club and foot.] Short in the foot, or crooked in the foot; "crumpfooted."

Colgrave.

CLUBHEAD.* adj. [from club and head] Having a thick head.

Small clubheaded anternae.

Derham.

CLUBLAW.* n. s. [from club and law.] Regulation by force; the law of arms.

The enemies of our happy establishment seem to have recourse to the laudable method of clublaw, when they find all other means for enforcing the absurdity of their opinions to be ineffectual.

Addison, Frecholder.

CLUBMAN.* n. s. [from club and man.] One who carries a club.

Alcides, surnam'd Hercules,

The only clubman of his time. Trag. of Soliman and Perseda.

CLUBROOM.* n. s. [from club and room.] The room in which a club or company assembles.

These ladies resolved to give the pictures of their deceased husbands to the clubroom.

Addison, Spectator.

To CLUCK. v. n. [from cluccian, Welsh; clochat, Armorick; cloccan, Saxon; klocken, Dutch.] To call chickens; as a hen.

She, poor hen, fond of no second brood,

Has cluck'd thee to the wars.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

Ducklings, though hatched by a hen, if she brings them to a river, in they go, though the hen clucks and calls to keep them out.

Ray on the Creation.

To CLUCK.* v. a. To call, as a hen calls chickens.

The following example has been given by Dr. Johnson under the verb neuter. See also To CLOCK.

She, poor hen, fond of no second brood,

Has cluck'd thee to the wars.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

CLUE.* n. s. The same as CLEW, which see. "A clue of yarn or thread."

Hufoet.

Speak, is't so?

If it be not, you have wound a goodly clue.

Shakspeare, All's Well.

CLUMP.† n. s. [formed from lump, Dr. Johnson says.

It is rather from the Germ. klump, a mass, a clod.

The Su. klamp is also an unshapen piece of wood.

Both perhaps from the Icel. klimpa.]

1. A shapeless piece of wood, or other matter, nearly equal in its dimensions.

2. A cluster of trees; a tuft of trees or shrubs: anciently a plump.

The small and circular clumps of firs, which I see planted upon some fine large swells, put me often in mind of a coronet placed on an elephant's or camel's back.

Shenstone.

To CLUMPER.* v. a. [Germ. klumpern.] To form into clumps or masses.

Vapours which now themselves consort

In several parts, and closely do conspire,

Clumper'd in balls of clouds.

More, Song of the Soul, Infin. of Worlds.

C L U

CLUMPS.† n. s. A numbscull. Skinner. In Lincolnshire, clumps is idle, lazy, unhandy. Grose. Perhaps a corruption of clumsy, which see. But clumperton was formerly our word for a clown. Sherwood. Clumpse is defined both by Sherwood and Cotgrave asleep, benumbed.

CLUMSILY. adv. [from clumsy.] Awkwardly; without readiness; without nimbleness; without grace.

He walks very clumsily and ridiculously. Ray on Creation. This lofty humour is clumsily and inartificially managed, when affected. Collier on Pride.

CLUMSINESS. n. s. [from clumsy.] Awkwardness; ungainliness; want of readiness, nimbleness, or dexterity.

The drudging part of life is chiefly owing to clumsiness and ignorance, which either wants proper tools, or skill to use them. Collier on Fame.

CLUMSY.† adj. [This word, omitted in other etymologists, is rightly derived by Bailey from lompsh, Dutch, stupid. In English, lump, clump, lumpish, clumpish, clumpishly, clumsily, clumsy. Still we may go to the Germ. klumpig, as the original; and not omit the Su. klampig, which means clumsy.] Awkward; heavy; artless; unhandy; without dexterity, readiness or grace. It is used either of persons, or actions, or things.

The matter ductile and sequacious, apt to be moulded into such shapes and machines, even by clumsy fingers. Ray.

But thou in clumsy verse, unlick'd, unpointed; Hast shamefully defy'd. Dryden.

That clumsy outside of a porter, How could it thus conceal a courtier? Swift.

CLUNG.† The preterite and participle of cling, formerly also written clong. [Sax. zeclungue.]

CLUNG.† adj. [clunzu, Sax.] Wasted with leanness; shrunk up with cold. See the citation from Shakspeare's Macbeth in To CLING. The word is yet used in the north of England for any thing shrivelled or shrunk. It is the past part. of cling, rather than an adjective.

To CLUNG.† v. n. [clunzan, Sax.]

1. To dry as wood does, when it is laid up after it is cut. See To CLING.

2. To adhere; to remain fixed.

Globes entire

With what's unreal thou coactive art. Shakspeare.

COA'CTIVELY.* adv. [from coactive.] In a compulsory or restrictive manner.

All legislative, judiciary, and dispensative power, coactively, in the exterior court of the church over English subjects.

Bp. Bramhall, Schisme Guarded, p. 177.

COADJU'MENT. n. s. [from con and adjumentum, Lat.] Mutual assistance. Dict.

COADJU'TANT. adj. [from con and adjuto.] Helping; co-operating.

Thracius coadjutant, and the roar
Of fierce Buroclydon. Philips.

COADJU'TOR.† n. s. [old Fr. coadjuteur.]

1. A fellow-helper; an assistant; an associate; one engaged in the assistance of another.

I should not succeed in a project, whereof I have had no hint from my predecessors the poets, or their seconds or coadjutors the critics. Dryden.

Away the friendly coadjutor flies. Garth's Dispensary.
A gownman of a different make,
Whom Pallas, once Vanessa's tutor,
Had fix'd on for her coadjutor. Swift.

2. [In the canon law.] One who is empowered or appointed to perform the duties of another.

A bishop that is unprofitable to his diocese ought to be deposed, and no coadjutor assigned him. Ayliffe.

Valerius proposed Augustine in his life-time to be designed bishop of Hippo, and to be joined fellow-bishop with himself, though it was flatly against the canons. For a coadjutor commonly proves an hinderer; and, by his envious clashing, deth often dig his partner's grave with whom he is joined.

Fuller, Holy State, p. 273.

I find a learned and late canonist has very much about coadjutors; but it is for coadjutors to archdeacons, and dignified men, below the order of bishops. Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 160.

COADJU'TRIX.* n. s. [from coadjutor.] She who is a fellow-helper.

She is admirably qualified to be his companion, confidant, counsellor, and coadjutrix. Smollett.

COADJU'VANCY. n. s. [from con and adjuvo, Lat.] Help; concurrent help; contribution of help; co-operation.

Crystal is a mineral body, in the difference of stones, made of a lentous percolation of earth, drawn from the most pure and limpid juice thereof, owing to the coldness of the earth, some concurrence, and coadjuvancy, but not immediate determination and efficiency. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COADU'NITION. n. s. [from con, ad, unitio, Lat.] The conjunction of different substances into one mass.

Bodies seem to have an intrinsic principle of, or corruption from the coadunition of particles endued with contrary qualities.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

COADVE'NTURER.* n. s. [from con and adventurer.] A fellow-adventurer.

There is a worthy captain in this town, who was coadventurer in that expedition. Howell, Lett. ii. 61.

To COAFFO'REST.* v. a. [from con and afforest.] To convert ground into forest.

Henry Fitz-Empresse (viz. the second) did coafforest much land, which continued all his reign, though much complained of. Howell, Lett. iv. 16.

Unfortunate Druina, and all her coafforested territories.

Ibid. iv. 23.

COA'GENT.* n. s. [from con and agent.] An associate; one co-operating with another.

Your doom is then

To marry this coagent of your mischiefs.

Beaumont and Fl. Knight of Malta.

To COAGMENT.† v. a. [old Fr. coagmenter, from con and agmen, Lat.] To congregate or heap together. I have only found the participate in use.

Had the world been coagmented from that supposed fortuitous jumble, this hypothesis had been tolerable. Glanville.

COAGMENTA'TION. n. s. [from coagment.] Collection, or coacervation into one mass; union; conjunction.

The third is the skin and coat, which rests in the well joining, cementing, and coagmentation of words; when as it is smooth, gentle, and sweet, &c. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

COA'GULABLE. adj. [from coagulate.] That which is capable of concretion.

Stones that are rich in vitriol, being often drenched with rain-water, the liquor will then extract a fine and transparent substance, coagulable into vitriol. Boyle.

To COA'GULATE. v. a. [coagulo, Lat.] To force into concretions; as, by the affusion of some other substance, to turn milk.

Roasted in wrath and fire,

And thus o'ersized with coagulate gore. Shakspeare.

Vivification ever consisteth in spirits attenuate, which the cold doth congeal and coagulate. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Bitumen is found in lumps, or coagulated masses, in some springs. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The milk in the stomach of calves, which is coagulated by the rennet, is again dissolved and rendered fluid by the gall in the duodenum. Arbuthnot.

To COA'GULATE. v. n. To run into concretions, or congelations.

Spirit of wine commixed with milk, a third part spirit of wine, and two parts milk, coagulateth little, but minglcth, and the spirit swims not above. Bacon.

About the third part of the oil olive, which was driven over into the receiver, did there coagulate into a whitish body, almost like butter. Boyle.

COAGULA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. coagulation.]

1. Concretion; congelation; the act of coagulating; the state of being coagulated.

From insensible attractions of most minute particles at the smallest distance, are derived cohesion, dissolution, coagulation, animal secretion, fermentation, and all chemical operations.

Rp. Berkely, Siris, § 236.

2. The body formed by coagulation.

As the substance of coagulations is not merely saline, nothing dissolves them but what penetrates and relaxes at the same time. Arbuthnot.

COA'GULATIVE. adj. [from coagulate.] That which has the power of causing concretion, or coagulation.

To manifest the coagulative power, we have sometimes in a minute arrested the fluidity of new milk, and turned it into a curdled substance, only by dexterously mingling with it a few drops of good oil of vitriol.

Boyle.

COAGULATOR. n. s. [from coagulate.] That which causes coagulation.

Coagulators of the humours are those things which expel the most fluid parts, as in the case of incrassating, or thickening; and by those things which suck up some of the fluid parts, as absorbents.

Arbuthnot.

COAK. n. s. See COKE.

COAL. † n. s. [col, Sax. kol, Germ. kole, Dut. kul, Danish.]

1. The common fossil fuel.

Coal is a black, sulphurous, inflammatory matter, dug out of the earth, serving for fuel, common in Europe, though the English coal is of most repute. One species of pit coal is called cannel, or canole coal, which is found in the northern counties; hard, glossy and light, apt to cleave into thin flakes, and, when kindled, yields a continual blaze 'till it be burnt out.

Chambers.

Coals are solid, dry, opaque, inflammable substances, found in large strata, splitting horizontally more easily than in any other direction; of a glossy hue, soft and friable, not fusible, but easily inflammable, and leaving a large residuum of ashes.

Hill on Fossils.

But age, enforce'd, falls by her own consent;

As coals to ashes, when the spirit's spent.

Denham.

We shall meet with the same mineral lodged in coals, that elsewhere we found in marble.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The cinder of scorched wood; charcoal.

Whatsoever doth so alter a body, as it returneth not again to that it was, may be called alteration major; as when cheese is made of curds, or coals of wood, or bricks of earth.

Bacon.

3. Fire; any thing inflamed or ignited.

You are no surer, no,

Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,

Or hailstones in the sun.

Shakspeare.

You have blown this coal betwixt my lord and me.

Shakspeare.

The rage of jealousy then fir'd his soul,

And his face kindled like a burning coal.

Dryden.

4. To call over the coals. An expression, not yet disused, signifying to call to a severe account; in allusion perhaps to the ancient ordeal of the burning ploughshare.

To COAL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To burn wood to charcoal.

Add the tinner's care and cost, in buying the wood for this service, felling, framing, and piling it to be burnt; in fetching the same when it is coaled, through such fur, foul, and cumbersome ways.

Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Charcoal of roots, coaled into great pieces, lasts longer than ordinary charcoal.

Bacon.

2. To delineate with a coal.

Marvailing, he coaled out rhimes upon the wall, near to the picture.

Camden.

COAL-BLACK. adj. [coal and black.] Black in the highest degree; of the colour of a coal.

As burning Ætna, from his boiling stew,
Doth belch out flames, and rocks in pieces broke,
And ragged ribs of mountains molten new,
Enwrapt in coal-black clouds and filthy smook.

Spenser, F. Q.

Ethiopians and negroes become coal-black from fuliginous effluences, and complectional tinctures.

Brown.

Coal-black his colour, but like jet it shone;

His legs and flowing tail were white alone.

Dryden.

COAL-BOX. n. s. [coal and box.] A box to carry coals to the fire.

Leave a pail of dirty water, a coal-box, a bottle, a broom, and such other unsightly things.

Swift.

COAL-FISH. n. s. [asellus niger.] A species of beardless gadus.

COAL-HOUSE. * n. s. [from coal and house.] A place to put coals in.

Bonner's conscience made his palace a coal-house, and a dungeon.

Junius, Sin Stigmatized, p. 812.

COAL-MINE. n. s. [from coal and mine.] A mine in which coals are dug; a coal-pit.

Springs injure land, that flow from coal-mines.

Mortimer.

COAL-MINER. * n. s. [from coal and mine.] One who works in a coal mine.

Like coalminers about a line, when the candles burning blue tell the damp cometh, they will fasten upon the bait.

Junius, Sin Stigm. p. 295.

COAL-PIT. n. s. [from coal and pit.] A pit made in the earth, generally to a great depth, for digging coals.

A leaf of the polypody kind, found in the sinking of a coal-pit.

Woodward.

COAL-SHIP. * n. s. [from coal and ship.] A ship that carries coals; what is now termed a collier.

The pirate never spends his shot upon coal-ships, but lets fly at the rich merchant.

Junius, Sin Stigm. p. 389.

COAL-STONE. n. s. [coal and stone.] A sort of cannel coal. See COAL.

Coal-stone flames easily, and burns freely; but holds and enlures the fire much longer than coal.

Woodward.

COAL-WORK. n. s. [coal and work.] A coalery; a place where coals are found.

There is a vast treasure in the old English, from whence authors may draw constant supplies; as our officers make their surest remits from the coal-works and the mines.

Fulton.

COALERY. n. s. [from coal.] A place where coals are dug.

Two fine stalactitæ were found hanging from a black stone, at a deserted vault in Benwell coalery.

Woodward.

To COAL'SCE. † v. n. [old Fr. coalescer, coalesco, Latin]

1. To unite in masses by a spontaneous approximation to each other.

When vapours are raised, they hinder not the transparency of the air, being divided into parts too small to cause any reflection in their superficies; but when they begin to coalesce, and constitute globules, those globules become of a convenient size to reflect some colours.

Newton.

2. To grow together; to join.

COALESCE. † n. s. [from coalesce.] The act of coalescing; concretion; union.

That he should not be aware of the future coalescence of these bodies into one.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, ch. 2.

But in the second consideration it is symptoma morbi, nempe solutæ unitatis, when by reason of the breaking of the Golden Bowl, and shrinking up into itself, there immediately follows a coalescence of all the vessels thereof.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 224.

From these modes of natural coalescence arises the grammatical regimen of the verb by its nominative, of the accusative by its verb.

Harris, Hermes, ii. §. 3.

COALITION. n. s. [from coalesco, coalitum, Latin.] Union in one mass or body; conjunction of separate parts in one whole.

The world's a mass of heterogeneous consistencies, and every part thereof a coalition of distinguishable varieties.

Glanville.

In the first coalition of a people, their prospect is not great: they provide laws for their present exigence.

Hale.

'Tis necessary that these squandered atoms should convene and unite into great masses: without such a coalition the chaos must have reigned to all eternity.

Bentley.

CO'ALY. adj. [from coal.] Containing coal.

Or coaly Tine, or ancient hallow'd Dec.

Milton, Vac. E.

COAPTA'TION. n. s. [from con and aplo, Lat.] The adjustment of parts to each other.

In a clock the hand is moved upon the dial, the bell is struck, and the other actions belonging to the engine are performed by virtue of the size, shape, bigness, and coaptation of the several parts. Boyle.

The same method makes both prose and verse beautiful, which consists in the judicious coaptation and ranging of the words. Broome.

To COARCT.† v. a. [from coarcto, Latin; coarcter, old Fr.]

1. To straighten; to confine into a narrow compass. Rancour coarcted, and long detained in a narrow room, at the last brasteth out with intolerable violence, and bringeth all to confusion. Sir T. Flyot, Gov. fol. 6.

The wind finding the room in the form of a trunk, and coarctated therein, forced the stones of the window like pellets, clean through it. Bacon.

2. To contract power; to restrain. If a man coarcts himself to the extremity of an act, he must blame and impute it to himself that he has thus coarcted or straightened himself so far. Ayliffe.

COARCTA'TION.† n. s. [from coarct; old Fr. coartacion.]

1. Confinement; restraint to a narrow space. The greatest winds, if they have no coartacion, or blow not hollow, give an interior sound. Bacon.

2. Contraction of any space. Straighten the artery never so much, provided the sides of it do not meet, the vessel will continue to beat below, or beyond the coarctation. Ray.

3. Restraint of liberty. Election is opposed not only to coercion, but also to coarctation, or determination to one. Bp. Bramhall.

COARSE.† adj. [The Goth. kaurids, heavy, depressed, seems akin to this word. "kauridai slepa, they were heavy with sleep," St. Luke, ix. 32.]

1. Not refined; not separated from impurities or baser parts.

I feel Of what coarse metal ye are molded. Shakespeare.

2. Not soft or fine; used of cloth, of which the threads are large.

In cloth is to be considered wool, the matter of it, whether it be coarse or fine. Scott's Essay on Drapery, (1635) p. 5.

3. Rude; uncivil; rough of manners. Those who have been polished in France, make use of the most coarse uncivilized words in our language, and utter themselves often in such a manner as a clown would blush to hear. Addison, Spect. No. 119.

4. Gross; not delicate. 'Tis not the coarser tie of human law That binds their peace. Thomson, Spring.

5. Inelegant; rude; unpolished. Praise of Virgil is against myself, for presuming to copy, in my coarse English, his beautiful expressions. Dryden.

6. Not nicely expert; unfinished by art or education. Practical rules may be useful to such as are remote from advice, and to coarse practitioners, which they are obliged to make use of. Arbutnot on Aliments.

7. Mean; not nice; not elegant; vile. Ill consort, and a coarse perfume, Disgrace the delicacy of a feast. Roscommon.
A coarse and useless dunghill weed, Fix'd to one spot, to rot just as it grows. Olway, Orphan.
From this coarse mixture of terrestrial parts, Desire and fear by turns possess their hearts. Dryden, Virg.

COARSELY.† adv. [from coarse.]

1. Without fineness; without refinement. John came neither eating nor drinking, but fared coarsely and poorly, according to the apparel he wore. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. Rudely; not civilly.

The good cannot be too much honoured, nor the bad too coarsely used. Dryden, Feb. Pref.

4. Inelegantly. Be pleased to accept the rudiments of Virgil's poetry, coarsely translated; but which yet retains some beauties of the author. Dryden, Virg. Ded.

5. Not delicately; grossly. There is a gentleman, that serves the count, Reports but coarsely of her. Shakespeare, All's Well.

CO'ARSENESS. n. s. [from coarse.]

1. Impurity; unrefined state. First know the materials whereof the glass is made; then consider what the reason is of the coarseness or clearness. Bacon, Essays.

2. Roughness; want of fineness.

3. Grossness; want of delicacy. Friends (pardon the coarseness of the illustration) as dogs in couples, should be of the same size. L'Estrange.

4. Roughness; rudeness of manners. A base wild olive he remains: The shrub the coarseness of the clown retains. Garth.

5. Meanness; want of nicety; Consider the penuriousness of the Hollanders, the coarseness of their food and raiment, and their little indulgences of pleasure. Addison on the War.

To COASSUME.* v. a. [from con and assume.] To take upon one's self.

Was it not enough to assume our nature, and the properties belonging to that nature, and the actions arising from those properties, but thou must coassume the weaknesses of nature, of properties, of actions?

Walsall, Life and Death of Christ, (1615,) B. 6. b.

COAST.† n. s. [coste, Fr. costa, Lat.]

1. The edge or margin of the land next the sea; the shore. It is not used for the banks of less waters. He sees in English ships the Holland coast. Dryden.

2. The border, limit, or frontier of a country. This meaning is given in our ancient lexicography; and what our present version of the N. Test. renders coasts, Wicliffe renders countries or ends. This sense is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

The four coasts and quarters of the world. Hulot.
Herod — slew all the children that were in Bethchem, and in all the coasts thereof. St. Matt. ii. 16.

The Jews — raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts. Acts, xiii. 50.

3. It seems to be taken by Newton for side, like the French coste. It was likewise so used by Bacon. And we still use the expression of a coast of mutton.

The south-east is found to be better for ripening of trees than the south-west; though the south-west be the hottest coast. Bacon.

Some kind of virtue, lodged in some sides of the crystal, inclines and bends the rays towards the coast, of unusual refraction; otherwise the rays would not be refracted towards that coast rather than any other coast, both at their incidence and at their emergence, so as to emerge by a contrary situation of the coast. Newton, Opt.

4. The COAST is clear. A proverbial expression. The danger is over; the enemies have marched off. Going out, and seeing that the coast was clear, Zelmame dismissed Musidorus. Sidney.

The royal spy, when now the coast was clear, Sought not the garden, but retired unseen. Dryden.

To COAST.† v. n. [old Fr. costoyer, old Eng. costay, Ch.]

1. To sail close by the coast; to sail within sight of land. But steer my vessel with a steady hand, And coast along the shore in sight of land. Dryden, Virgil.

The ancients coasted only in their navigation, seldom taking the open sea. Arbutnot on Coins

2. To approach; to draw near. See To ACCOST.

Where towards me a sorry wight did coast.

And all in haste she coasteth to the cry.
Spenser, Daphnida.
Shakespeare, Ven. and Adonis.

To COAST.† v. a.

1. To sail by; to sail near to.

Nearchus, the admiral of Alexander, not knowing the compass, was fain to coast that shore.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The greatest entertainment we found in coasting it, were the several prospects of woods, vineyards, meadows, and corn fields, which lie on the borders of it.
Addison on Italy.

2. To keep close to; to pursue.

William Douglas still coasted the Englishmen, doing them what damage he might.
Holished's Chron. iii. 352.

We'll gallop to Segovia,
And if we light of no news there, hear nothing;
We'll e'en turn fairly home, and coast the other side.
Beaum. and Fl. The Pilgrim.

My lord is coasted one way,
My father, though his hurts forbid his travel,
Hath took another.
Beaum. and Fl. Lover's Progress.

CO'ASTER. n. s. [from coast.] He that sails near the shore.

In our small skiff we must not launch too far;
We here but coasters, not discoverers are.
Dryden.

COAT.† n. s. [cotte, Fr. cotta, Ital. Dr. Johnson says. To these may be added the Germ. cutt, probably from the Celt. kutten, to cover; Goth. kot. The Armorick cod is a garment which covers the breast. The Lat. cocla is termed a coat: "Interior tunica cocla vocatur," Poggii Facetiae, p. 462. Low Lat. cota and cotta. V. Du Cange.]

1. The upper garment.

He was armed with a coat of mail, and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass.
1 Sam. xvi. 5.
The coat of many colours they brought to their father, and said, This have we found; know now whether it be thy son's coat or no.
Genesis, xxxvii. 30.

2. Petticoat; the habit of a boy in his infancy; the lower part of a woman's dress.

A friend's younger son, a child in coats, was not easily brought to his book.
Locke.

3. The habit or vesture, as demonstrative of the office.
For his intermeddling with arms, he is the more excusable, because many of his coat, in those times, are not only martial directors, but commanders.
Howell, Vocal Forest.

Men of his coat should be minding their prayers,
And not among ladies to give themselves airs.
Swift.

4. The hair or fur of a beast; the covering of any animal. So a hawk of the first coat, two years old.

He clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts; or slain,
Or, as the snake, with youthful coat repaid;
And thought not much to clothe his enemies.
Milton, P. E.
Give your horse some powder of brimstone in his oats, and it will make his coat lie fine.
Mortimer's Husbandry.

You have given us milk
In luscious streams, and lent us your own coat
Against the winter's cold.
Thomson, Spring.

5. Any tegument; tunick; or covering.

The eye is defended with four coats or skins.
Peacham.
The optick nerves have their medullary parts terminating in the brain, their teguments terminating in the coats of the eye.
Derham, Physico-Theol.

Amber is a nodule, invested with a coat, called rock-amber.
Woodward on Fossils.

6. That on which the ensigns armorial are portrayed. [allied to the Gr. σχιτρος, a shield.]

The herald of love's mighty king,
In whose coat armour richly are display'd
All sorts of flowers the which on earth do spring.
Spenser.
Cropp'd are the flower-de-luces in your arms;
Of England's coat one half is cut away.
Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. 1.

Those other glorious notes,
Inscribed in touch, or marble, or the coats
Painted or carv'd upon our great men's tombs,
Or in their windows, do but prove the wombs
That bred them graves.
B. Jonson, Forest.

At each trumpet was a banner bound,
Which, waving in the wind, display'd at large
Their master's coat of arms and knightly charge.
Dryden.

7. A card, called rightly a coat-card, and corruptly a court-card. See COAT-CARD.

Some may be coats, as in the cards.
B. Jonson, New Inn.
O, Gnotho, how is't? here's a trick of discarded cards of us!
We were rank'd with coats, as long as old master lived.
Massinger, Old Law.

To COAT.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover; to invest; to overspread; as, to coat a retort; to coat a ceiling.

The ill man rides through all confidently; he is coated and booted for it.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

A victor he, from the deep phalanx pierc'd
Of iron-coated Macedon.
Thomson, Liberty, iii. 262.

COAT-CARD.* n. s. This expression is taken from the dress or coat, in which the king, queen, and knave, principal cards, are represented; and not from court, as it has often been pretended. See 7th sense of COAT.

Mad. We call'd him a coat-card
O' the last order.

Pen. jun. What's that? a knave?

Mad. Some readings have it so; my manuscript
Doth speak it varlet.
B. Jonson, Staple of News.

To COAX.† v. a. [B. Jonson writes it cokes. It may be a corruption of our word cock or cocker. But bishop Kennet and Lye think it formed from cog, a boat; whence cogcrones, and cociones; and so applying the custom of sailors begging money by pretences of shipwreck and other losses to coaxing or wheedling men out of their charity. This will hardly be received. Lye applies the same to the verb Cog. Coaxation has been adopted from the sound or usage of many words. To coax is indeed to employ, in low language, much croaking. The Lat. coaxo, and the old Fr. coaxer is, to croak like a frog; and in imitation of this word, derived from Aristoplianes's chorus of frogs chanting χαε, χαε, Featley has coined coaxation, which however he uses ambiguously, or at least contemptuously. "Now that I have set up a light on the banks, and clearly discovered both them [the Anabaptists] and their errors; I hope we shall see no more of their frog-galliards, nor hear of their harsh croaking and coaxation either in the pulpit or the press." Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 227.] To wheedle; to flatter; to humour. A low word.

The nurse had changed her note; she was nuzzling and coaxing the child; that's a good dear, says she. L'Estrange.
I coax! I wheedle! I'm above it. Farquhar, Rec. Officer.

COAX.* n. s. [from the verb.] A dupe.

Go! you're a brainless coax, a toy, a fop.

Beaum. and Fl. Wit at sev. Weapons.
Why, we will make a cokes of this wise master,
We will, my mistress, an absolute fine cokes,
And mock, to air, all the deep diffidences
Of such a solemn and effectual ass.

B. Jonson, The Devil is an Ass.

COAXA'TION.* n. s. [from coax.] The art of coaxing, or flattering for any particular purpose. See To COAX.

CO'AXER. n. s. [from the verb.] A wheedler; a flatterer.

C O B

COB. A word often used in the composition of low terms; corrupted from cop, Sax. kopp, Germ. the head or top.

COB.† n. s.

1. A sort of sea fowl, called also sea-cob; the sea-mew. Phillips.
2. In some provinces, and probably in old language, a spider; whence cobweb. [Dutch, cob, a spider.]
3. A horse not castrated. In our northern dialect, cob is a testicle.
4. A coin, so called perhaps from its roundness: so cob-nut, a corruption of the Sax. cop, a head.
He then drew out a large leathern bag, and poured out the contents, which were silver cobs, upon the table. Sheridan's Life of Swift, § 1.

CO'BALT. n. s. A marcasite frequent in Saxony.

Cobalt is plentifully impregnated with arsenick; contains copper and some silver. Being sublimed, the flores are of a blue colour: these German mineralists call zaffir. Woodward.

Cobalt is a dense, compact, and ponderous mineral, very bright and shining, and much resembling some of the antimonial ores. It is found in Germany, Saxony, Bohemia, and England; but ours is a poor kind. From cobalt are produced the three sorts of arsenick, white, yellow, and red; as also zaffre and smalt. Hill on Fossils.

To COBBLE. v. a. [kobler, Danish.]

1. To mend any thing coarsely; used generally of shoes.

If you be out, sir, I can mend you. — Why, sir, cobble you. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

They'll sit by th' fire, and presume to know
What's done i'th' capitol; making parties strong,
And feeble such as stand not in their liking,
Below their cobbled shoes. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Many underlayers, when they could not live upon their trade, have raised themselves from cobbling to fluxing. I. Estrange.

2. To do or make any thing clumsily, or unhandily.

Reject the nauseous praises of the times;
Give thy base poets back their cobbled rhimes. Dryden.
Is it not a firmer foundation for contentment and tranquillity, to believe that all things were at first created, and are since continually ordered and disposed for the best, and that principally for the benefit and pleasure of man; than that the whole universe is mere bungling and blundering;—nothing effected for any purpose or design, but all ill favourably cobbled and jumbled together? Bentley, Sermon.

CO'BBLE, or CO'BLE.* n. s.

1. A fishing boat. [Sax. cuople.]

Every day the cobles, or little fishing boats, are drawn on shore. Pennant.

2. A pebble; still used in this sense, in the north of England. "As hard as a cobble."

Their hands shook swords, their slings held cobbles round. Fairfax, Tasso, xx. 29.

CO'BBLER. n. s. [from cobble.]

1. A mender of old shoes.

Not many years ago it happened that a cobbler had the casting vote for the life of a criminal. Addison on Italy.

2. A clumsy workman in general.

What trade are you?—

Truly, sir, in respect of a fine workman, I am but, as you would say, a cobbler. Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar.

3. In a kind of proverbial sense, any mean person.

Think you the great prerogative I enjoy
Of doing ill, by virtue of that race;
As if what we esteem in cobblers base,
Would the high family of Brutus grace? Dryden, Juv.

CO'BOALS.* n. s. Large round coals. North.

Grose.

C O B

CO'BIRONS. n. s. [cob and iron.] Irons with a knob at the upper end.

The implements of the kitchen; as spits, ranges, cobirons, and pots. Bacon, Phys. Rem.

CO'BISHOP. n. s. [con and bishop.] A coadjutant bishop. Valerius, advanced in years, and a Grecian by birth, not qualified to preach in the Latin tongue, made use of Austin as a cobishop, for the benefit of the church of Hippo. Ayliffe.

CO'BLOAF.* n. s. A crusty uneven loaf. North. Shakspeare applies the word contemptuously to personal appearance, where Ajax calls Thersites "a cobloaf," Tr. and Cressida. A corruption of cop; a loaf with a large head.

CO'BNUT.† n. s. [cob and nut.]

1. A boy's game; the conquering nut.
2. A large nut; what some now call the nut of the Barcelona hazle, and what was formerly "the name of a walnut." Barret.

COBO'B.* n. s. See CABOB.

CO'BSTONES.* n. s. Large stones. North. Grose.

CO'BSWAN.† n. s. [cob, and swan.] The head or leading swan; Dr. Johnson says. I should rather suppose the male swan. See COB.

I'm not taken

With a cobswan, or a high-mounting buil,
As foolish Leda and Europa were. B. Jonson, Catiline.

CO'WEB.† n. s. [kopweb, Dutch; atzen-coppa, Sax. atter-cop, Cumb. the spider's web.]

1. The web or net of a spider: from cob, a spider. [See COB.]

The luckless Clarion,
With violent swift flight, forth carried
Into the cursed cobweb, which his foe
Had framed for his final overthrow. Spenser.

Is supper ready, the house trimmed, rushes strewed, and cobwebs swept? Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

The spider in the house of a burgher, fell presently to her net-work of drawing cobwebs up and down. I. Estrange.

2. Any snare, or trap; implying insidiousness and weakness.

For lie a rope of sand could twist,

As tough as learned Sorbonist;

And weave fine cobwebs fit for scull

That's empty, when the moon is full. Hudibras.

Laws are like cobwebs, which may catch small flies; but let wasps and hornets break through. Swift.

CO'WEB.* adj. This word is often used adjectively, both simply and figuratively, denoting any thing fine, slight, or flimsy; whence the application of it to lawn, a fashionable article of female dress in elder times. In Norfolk, a cobweb morning is a misty morning.

Break through such tender cobweb niceties,

That oft entangle these blind buzzing flies.

Mare, Philos. Poems, p. 319.

Item, a charm surrounding fearfully

Your partic-per-pale picture one half drawn

In solemn cyprus, th' other cobweb lawn. B. Jonson, Epig.

The worst are good enough for such a trifle,

Such a proud piece of cobweb lawn.

Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady.

Chronology at best is but a cobweb law, and he broke through it with his weight. Dryden.

Opinion's feeble coverings, and the veil

Spun from the cobweb fashion of the times

To hide the feeling heart. Akenside, Pleas. of Imag. B. 2.

CO'BWEBBED.* adj. [from cobweb. Employed by one of our forgotten poets, and borrowed by Young.] Covered with the webs of spiders.

Who love the golden mean, doth safely want

A cobwebb'd cot, and wrongs entail'd upon't.

Lovelace, Lucasta, Posth. p. 57.

The cobwebb'd cottage, with its ragged wall
Of mouldering mud, is royalty to me. Young, Night Th. 1.
Coca. See CACAO, and COTOA.
Cocci'ferous. adj. [from κοκκός, and fero, Lat.]
All plants or trees are so called that have berries.

Quincy.
COCCULUS INDICUS.* [Lat.] A poisonous narcotick berry, known mostly now to poachers, who have got a trick of intoxicating fish therewith, so as to take them out of the water with their hands; for which reason these berries are called baccæ piscatoriae, fisher-berries. Chambers.

COCCYX.* n. s. [Lat. coccyx, the cuckoo.] In anatomy, a bone joined to the extremity of the os sacrum; so called, as some think, from its resemblance to the beak of a cuckoo.

CO'CHINEAL. n. s. [cochinilla, Span. a woodlouse.]
An insect gathered upon the opuntia, and dried: from which a beautiful red colour is extracted.

Hill.
CO'CHLEARY. adj. [from cochlea, Lat. a screw.] Screw-form; in the form of a screw.

That at St. Dennis, near Paris, hath wreathy spire, and cochleary turnings about it, which agreeth with the description of the unicorn's horn in Jelian. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'CHLEATED. adj. [from cochlea, Lat.] Of a screwed or turbinated form.

Two pieces of stone, struck forth of the cavity of the umbilici of shells, of the same sort with the foregoing: they are of a cochleated figure. Woodward on Fossils.

COCK.† n. s. [cocc, Saxon; coq, French; κόκκυξ, Gr. whence κόκκυξ, to crow like a cock.]

1. The male to the hen; a domestick fowl, remarkable for his gallantry, pride, and courage.

Cocks have great combs and spurs; hens, little or none.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

True corks o' th' game,
That never ask for what, or whom, they fight;
But turn 'em out, and shew 'em but a foe,
Cry liberty, and that's a cause of quarrel. Dryden.

The careful hen
Calls all her chirping family around,
Fed and defended by the fearless cock. Thomson, Spring.

2. The male of any small birds.

Calves and philosophers, tygers and statesmen, cock sparrows and coquets, exactly resemble one another in the formation of the pineal gland. Arbutnot and Pope.

3. The weathercock, that shews the direction of the wind by turning.

You cataracts and hurricanoes spout,
'Till you have drench'd our steeples, drown'd the cocks!
Shakspeare.

4. A spout to let out water at will, by turning the stop. The handle had probably a cock on the top. Things that were contrived to turn seem anciently to have had that form, whatever was the reason.

When every room
Hath blaz'd with lights, and bray'd with minstrelsy,
I have retir'd me to a wasteful cock,
And set mine eyes at flow. Shakspeare.

It were good there were a little cock made in the belly of the upper glass. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Thus the small jett, which hasty hands unlock,
Spirits in the gard'ner's eyes who turns the cock. Pope.

5. The notch of an arrow.

6. The part of the lock of a gun that strikes with the flint. [From cocca, Ital. the notch of an arrow. Skinper. Perhaps from the action, like that of a cock pecking; but it was, I think, so called when it had not its present form.]

With hasty rage he snatch'd
His gunshot, that in holsters watch'd,
And bending cock, he level'd full
Against th' outside of Talgol's skull. Hudibras.

A seven-shot gun carries powder and bullets for seven charges and discharges. Under the breech of the barrel is one box for the powder; a little before the lock another for the bullets; behind the cock a charger, which carries the powder from the box to a funnel at the further end of the lock. Greiv.

7. A conquerour; a leader; a governing man.

Sir Andrew is the cock of the club since he left us. Addison.
My schoolmaster call'd me a dunce and a fool;
But at cuffs I was always the cock of the school. Swift.

8. Cockcrowing; a note of the time in a morning.

We were carousing till the second cock. Shakspeare.
He begins at curfew, and goes 'till the first cock. Shakspeare.

9. A cockboat; a small boat.

They take view of all sized cocks, barges, and fisherboats hovering on the coast. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach,
Appear like mice; and yond tall anchoring bark,
Diminish'd to her cock; her cock, a buoy,
Almost too small for sight. Shakspeare.

10. A small heap of hay. [Properly cop.]

As soon as the dew is off the ground, spread the hay again, and turn it, that it may wither on the other side: then handle it, and, if you find it dry, make it up into cocks. Mortimer.

11. The form of a hat. [From the comb of the cock.]

You see many a smart rhetorician turning his hat in his hands, moulding it into several different cocks. Addison.

12. The style or gnomion of a dial. Chambers.

13. The needle of a balance.

14. Cock on the Hoop. Triumphant; exulting. [Some think that this expression is taken from one who madly draws the cock out of a barrel, and lays it on the hoop or top of the cask, letting all the liquor run to waste. But Cotgrave, under the old Fr. adjective hupé, gives us "copped, crested; hence also, proud, cocket, loftie, statelié, that bears himself high, that thinks well of himselfe." This etymology will probably be preferred.]

Now I am a frisker, all men on me look;
What should I do but set cock on the hoop? Camden, Remains.

You'll make a mutiny among my guests!
You will set cock a hoop! Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

For Hudibras, who thought he had won
The field, as certain as a gun,
And having routed the whole troop,
With victory was cock a hoop. Hudibras.

15. Cock and a Bull. An expression yet in use, though unnoticed in our dictionaries; denoting tedious, unmeaning stories; mere babble.

Some men's sole delight is, to take tobacco, and drink all day long in a tavern or ale-house, to discourse, sing, jest, roar, talk of a cock and a bull over a pot, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 271.

To Cock. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To set erect; to hold bolt upright, as a cock holds his head.

This is that muscle which performs the motion so often mentioned by the Latin poets, when they talk of a man's cocking his nose, or playing the rhinoceros. Addison.

Our Lightfoot barks, and cocks his ears;
O'er yonder stile see Lubberkin appears. Gay, Pastorals.

Dick would cock his nose in scorn,
But Tom was kind and loving. Swift.

2. To set up the hat with an air of petulance and pertness.

Dick, who thus long had passive sat,
Here strok'd his chin and cock'd his hat. Prior.

An alert young fellow cock'd his hat upon a friend of his who entered. Addison, Spectator.

3 To mould the form of the hat.

4 To fix the cock of a gun ready for a discharge.

Some of them holding up their pistols cocked, near the door of the house, which they kept open. Dryden, Ded. Est.

5 To raise hay in small heaps.

Sike'mirth in May is meetest for to make, Or summer shade, under the cocked hay. Spenser, Shep. Cal.

To COCK.† v. n.

1. To strut; to hold up the head, and look big, or menacing; or pert.

Now in our times—war is made as much by money as by sword; and he that may longest pay his soldiers, goeth victor away. And if they be both disposed to cock it thoroughly, yet when they both be made bankrupts, then they must needs conclude a peace. Sir T. Smith, Orat. III. Append. to his Life.

Belshazzar was found wanting of days attainable by his age and constitution, in that he was found cocking up against God.

Archdeacon Arndt's Alurum, (1661,) p. 161.

Sir Fopling is a fool so nicely writ, The ladies would mistake him for a wit; And when he sings, talks loud, and cocks, would cry, I vow, methinks, he's pretty company. Dryden.

Every one cocks and struts upon it, and pretends to overlook us. Addison, Guardian.

2. To train or use fighting cocks.

Cries out 'gainst cocking, since he cannot bet. B. Jonson.

3. To cocker; to indulge too much.

Where cocking dads make sawie lads In youth to rage, to beg in age. Tusser, in his own Life, p. 162.

COCK, in composition, signifies small or little.

COCKA'DE.† n. s. [from cock.] A ribband worn in the hat.

Pert infidelity is wit's cockade. Young, Night Th. 7.

COCKA'DEN.* adj. [from cockade.] Wearing a cockade in the hat.

A pamper'd spendthrift, whose fantastick air, Well-fashion'd figure, and cockaded brow, He took in change. Young, Night Th. 5.

CO'CKAL.* n. s. Formerly used for the die itself, and for a game similar to that at dice; the "play at the huckle bone," as Barret calls it.

The ancients used to play at cockal, or casting of huckle-bones, which is done with smooth sheep's bones.

Kinder's Sanct. of Salvation, (1658,) p. 368.

Cockals, which the Dutch call teelings, are different from dice; for they are square with four sides, and dice have six. Ibid.

COCKATO'O.* n. s. [probably from the Fr. caqueteur, a prattler; though Sir T. Herbert offers a punning, but not admissible, etymology.] A bird of the parrot kind.

Here are also—in the Mauritius] herons white and beautiful;—cacatoes, a sort of parrot, whose nature may well take name from cacatoe, it is so fierce and so indomitable. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 383.

She had two little dogs on a cushion in her lap, and a cockatoo on her shoulder. Gray, Lett. to Dr. Warton.

CO'CKATRICE.† n. s. [from cock and atrep, Sax. a serpent; or rather from the old Fr. cocatrice.] A serpent supposed to rise from a cock's egg.

They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices. Shakespeare.

This was the end of this little cockatrice of a king, that was able to destroy those that did not spy him first. Bacon.

This cockatrice is soonest crushed in the shell; but, if it grows, it turns to a serpent and a dragon. Bp. Taylor.

My wife! 'tis she, the very cockatrice! Congreve.

CO'CKBOAT.† n. s. A small boat belonging to a ship. Formerly cogboat. See COG. And sometimes cocket. [low Lat. coca; Armor. coket.]

That invincible armada, which having not fired a cottage of ours at land, nor taken a cockboat of ours at sea, wandered through the wilderness of the northern seas. Bacon.

Did they think it less dishonour to God to be like a brute, or a plant, or a cockboat, than to be like a man. Stillingfleet.

CO'CKBRAINED.* adj. Giddy; rash; hairbrained.

His instances out of the common law are all so quite beside the matter which he would prove, as may be a warning to all clients how they venture their business with such a cock-brained solicitor. Milton, Colasterion.

CO'CKBROTH. n. s. Broth made by boiling a cock.

Diet upon spoon-ments; as veal or cockbroths prepared with French barley. Harvey on Consumptions.

CO'CKCROWING. n. s. [cock and crow.] The time at which cocks crow; the morning.

Ye know not when the master of the house cometh; at even, or at midnight, or at the cockcrowing, or in the morning. St. Mark, xiii. 35.

To CO'CKER.† v. a. [coqueline, French, Dr. Johnson says. It may, however, be a word of northern origin. Goth. bikukjan, to kiss. "Ni swaif bikukjan fotuns meinans," St. Luke, vii. 45. Hath not ceased to kiss my feet.] To caress; to fondle; to indulge.

Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid. Eccles. xxx. 9.

Shall a heedless boy, A cocker'd silken wanton brave our fields? Shakespeare, K. John.

What should I do, But cocker up my genius, and live free. B. Jonson, For.

To all delights my fortune calls me to. He that will give his son sugar-plums to make him learn, does but authorize his love of pleasure, and cocker up that propensity which he ought to subdue. Locke on Education.

Bred a fondling and an heiress; Dress'd like any lady may'ress, Cocker'd by the servants round, Was too good to touch the ground. Swift.

CO'CKER. n. s. [from cock.] One who follows the sport of cockfighting.

CO'CKER.* n. s. A sort of spatterdash. The word is yet used in the north of England.

Now doth he inty scorn his Kendal green, And his patch'd cockers now despised been. Bp. Hall, Sat. B. 4. S. 6.

CO'CKEREL. n. s. [from cock.] A young cock.

Which of them first begins to crow?—

The old cock?—The cockerel. Shakespeare.

What wilt thou be, young cockerel, when thy spurs

Are grown to sharpness? Dryden.

CO'CKERING.* n. s. [from cocker.] Indulgence.

Barret, and Sherwood. What discipline is this, Parents, to nourish violent affections in youth, by cockering and wanton indulgencies, and to chastise them in mature age with a boyish rod of correction. Milton, Doct. and Dico. of Divorce.

Most children's constitutions are spoiled by cockering and tenderness. Locke on Education.

CO'CKET.* adj. [from To cock.] Brisk; pert; "to wax cocket." Sherwood.

CO'CKET.† n. s. [Of uncertain derivation, Dr. Johnson says. Possibly, in the sense of acquittance, the warrant being delivered to the merchant, from "quo quietus recessit," according to the form of acquittances or discharges given at the Exchequer, usually concluding, abinde recessit quietus.]

1. A seal belonging to the king's customhouse: likewise a scroll of parchment, sealed and delivered by the officers of the customhouse to merchants, as a warrant that their merchandize is entered. Cowel.

The greatest profit did arise by the cocket of hides; for wool and woolsells were ever of little value in this kingdom. Darwin.

2. A cock-boat. [old Fr. cocquet. See COCK-BOAT.] Sherwood.

COCKFIGHT. † } n. s. [cock and fight.] A battle or COCKFIGHTING. } match of cocks.

In cockfights, to make one cock more hardy, and the other more cowardly. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

All we have seen compar'd to his experience,
 Has been but endgel-play or cock-fighting.

Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

At the seasons of foot ball and cockfighting, these little republics reassume their national hatred to each other.

Addison.

COCKHORSE. adj. [cock and horse.] On horseback; triumphant; exulting.

Alma, they strenuously maintain,
 Sits cockhorse on her throne, the brain.

Prior.

COCKING.* n. s. [from To cock.] The sport of cockfighting.

The cocking holds at Derby.

Beaum. and Fl. Monsieur Thomas.

COCKLE. † n. s. [coquille, French, cochlea, Lat. κόχλις, Gr. from κόχλω, to turn round. Dr. Johnson has given a second definition of this word, viz. a little or young cock, of which he gives a pretended example from Spenser's Shep. Calendar: "as cockle on his dunghill; &c." But, in truth, Spenser has no such word. The true reading is, "as cocke on his dunghill crowing craneke," Septemb. ver. 46.] A small testaceous fish.

It is a cockle, or a walnut shell.

Shakspeare.

We may, I think, from the make of an oyster, or cockle, reasonably conclude, that it has not so many, nor so quick senses, as a man.

Locke.

Three common cockle shells, out of gravel pits. Woodward.

COCKLE-STAIRS. n. s. Winding or spiral stairs.

Chambers.

COCKLE. † n. s. [coccel, Saxon; lolium, zizania, Lat.] A weed that grows in corn. The same with cornrose; a species of poppy.

Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley.

Joh. xxxi. 40.

You make mountains not of mole-hills, but of moles; long harvest for a small deal not of corn, but of cockle; and (as one said at the shearing of hogs) great cry for a little, and that not very fine, wool.

Hayward, Answ. to Doleman, ch. 7.

In soothing them we nourish, 'gainst our senate,

The cockle of rebellion, insolence, sedition.

Shakspeare.

Good seed degenerates, and oft obeys

The soil's disease, and into cockle strays.

Danne.

To COCKLE. † v. a. [from cockle.] To contract into wrinkles like the shell of a cockle; "to crumple."

Sherwood.

Showers soon drench the camblet's cockled grain.

Gay.

COCKLED. adj. [from cockle.] Shelled; or perhaps cochleate, turbinated.

Love's feeling is more soft and sensible,

Than are the tender horns of cockled snails.

Shakspeare.

COCKLER.* n. s. [from cockle.] One whose trade it is to take and sell cockles. Used in the north of England.

An old fisherman, mending his nets, told me a moving story; how a brother of the trade, a cockler, as he styled him, driving a little cart with two daughters, &c.

Gray, Lett. to Dr. Warton.

COCKLOFT. † n. s. [cock and loft.] The room over the garret, in which fowls are supposed to roost, unless it be rather corrupted from coploft, the cop or top of the house. It is written colloft by Fuller in his Holy State, and cockleloft repeatedly by Anthony Wood in his life of himself.

The word canaculum in the most usual and latest Roman sense is still meant of the garret, or cockloft as we call it; which was indeed the most contemptible part of the house, and of no better use than to be hired out to very ordinary and common people.

Gregory's Notes on Scripture, p. 16.

If the lowest floors already burn,
Cocklofts and garrets soon will take their turn. Dryden, Juv.
 My garrets, or rather my cocklofts indeed, are very indifferently furnished; but they are rooms to lay lumber in.

Swift

COCKMASTER. n. s. [cock and master.] One that breeds game cocks.

A cockmaster bought a partridge, and turned it among the fighting cocks.

L'Estrange.

COCKMATCH. n. s. [cock and match.] Cockfight for a prize.

At the same time that the heads of parties preserve towards one another an outward shew of good breeding, their tools will not so much as mingle at a cockmatch.

Addison.

Though quail-fighting is what is most taken notice of, they had doubtless cockmatches also.

Arbuthnot and Pope.

COCKNEY. † n. s. [A word of which the original is much controverted. The French use an expression, Païs de Cocaigne, for a country of dainties.

Paris est pour un riche un païs de Cocaigne.

Boileau.

Of this word they are not able to settle the original. It appears, whatever was its first ground, to be very ancient, being mentioned in an old Normanno-Saxon poem:

Far in see bý west Spayng,

Is a lond yhoce Cocaýng.

On which Dr. Hickee has this remark: "Nunc coquin, coquine. Quæ olim apud Gallas otio, gulæ & ventri deditos, ignavum, ignavam, desidiosum, desidiosam, segnem significabant. Hinc urbanos utpote à rusticis laboribus ad vitam sedentariam, & desidiosam avocatos pagani nostri olim cocaignes, quod nunc scribitur cockneys, vocabant. Et poëta hic noster in monachos, & moniales, ut segne genus hominum, qui desidie dediti, ventri indulgebant, & coquinae amatores erant, malevolentissime invehitur, monasteria & monasticam vitam, in descriptione terræ Cockaince, parabolice perstringens." So far Dr. Johnson. — The etymology of this word has indeed exercised the conjectures of the learned in various ways. Meric Casaubon would refer it to the Greek οικογενής, (oicogenes), one born and bred at home. Gratifying as such an origin must be, in point of classical antiquity, to those who are still called cockneys, it would now be difficult to find a believer in this imposing and sonorous etymon! — One of our oldest lexicographers thus defines a cockney, "molliculus, ineptus, delicatus, qui nescit res discernere, et qui se inaniter jactat," an effeminate, foolish fellow, who knows not how to distinguish things, and who is also very conceited, Huloet; who, in a similar manner, explains to play the cockney, to play the fool. After him comes Barret, late in the reign of Elizabeth, who defines a cockney, "a child tenderly brought up, a dearling." This may seem to countenance the opinion of those, who derive the word from cocker or cock; and which Decker, a writer contemporary with Barret, in his "Knight's Conjuring," boldly affirms to be the derivation. "Tis not their fault, but our mothers', our cockering mothers', who for their labour make us to be called cockneys." Pegge, in his Anecdotes of the Eng. Language, inclines to this etymology; deducing it, however, from the old Fr. coquelinc, to fondle, particip. coqueliné, whence, by dropping the penultimate, coquené. Mr. Douce thinks, that the word may have once been a term of fondness used towards male children, (in London more particularly,) as pigney in like manner has been applied to a woman. Mr. Ellis, in his specimens of the Early English Poets, deduces it, in conformity to a remark made by Mr. Tyrwhitt that the word is probably borrowed originally from the kitchen, i. e. from coquina; and he cites a passage from Pierce Plowman's Visions, "I have no salt bacon, ne no cokeney, collops for to make," to shew that cockney means a cook, and that therefore the intelligence which the inhabitants of the metropolis displayed in the culinary art might have procured them the appellation of cockneys from the uplandish or country-men. But cokeney, in the passage which he cites, unfortunately, means nothing more than a little cock,* as Mr. Douce also has observed; the dish to be prepared, but not the cook to dress it. The authority of Bishop Percy and Mr. Tyrwhitt in thus also assigning, in the old ballad of The Turnament of Tötenham, the meaning of cook to cockney, has been rightly questioned by Mr. Douce.

At that feast were they served in rich array,

Every five and five had a cokeney :

Where it signifies a little cock, or perhaps a peacock, a favourite dish among our ancestors. Cotgrave, under the word COQUINE, calls a "cockney a snapper-de-cockit, a nice thing." The citation of Camden in his Britannia,

Were I in my castle of Bungey

Upon the river of Waveney

I would ne care for the king of Cockney :

shews, whencesoever the triplet comes, that London was known by this name; and hence a cockney might be assumed for a Londoner. After all, there is most reason to believe, that this contemptuous or satirical expression originates in that imaginary region of luxury and idleness formerly called Cocaigne, or Plenty; as in the poem cited by Hickes. Probably the festival of the Cocagna at Naples may have suggested the poem as well as the word. See Keyser's Trav. vol. ii. p. 369. Hobbes, in allusion to the old poem, has "the land of Cockany, where fowls ready roasted cry, come and eat me;" for, among the delicacies of this happy country, ready roasted geese fly into the house, exclaiming, all hot, all hot !

'The gees irosted on the spitte,

Flee to that abbai, god hit wot,

And gredith, [crieth,] Gees al hote !

Perhaps, no apology is necessary for so long a remark on cockney; which, however, is now falling into little use.]

1. A native of London, by way of contempt.

So the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i' the pasty alive. Shakspeare, King Lear.

For who is such a cockney in his heart,
Proud of the plenty of the southern part,
To scorn that union, by which we may

Boast 'twas his countryman that writ this play? Dorset.

Hence I believe it was, that that synod's geography was as ridiculous as a *cockney, to whom all is Barbary beyond Brainford, and Christendome endeth at Greenwich.

VOL. I.

Whitlock, Mdm. of the English, (1654,) p. 221.

The cockney travelling into the country, is surprized at many common practices of rural affairs. Watts.

2. Any effeminate, ignorant, low, mean, despicable citizen.

I am afraid this great lubber, the world, will prove a cockney.

Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

COCKNEYLIKE.* adj. Resembling the manners or character of a cockney.

Some again draw this mischief on their heads by too ceremonious and strict diet, being over precise, cockney-like, and curious in their observations of meats, times, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 76.

COCKPIT. n. s. [cock and pit.]

1. The area where cocks fight.

Can this cockpit hold,

The vasty field of France?

Shakspeare.

And now have I gained the cockpit of the western world, and academy of arms, for many years. Howell, Vocal Forest.

2. A place on the lower deck of a man of war, where are sub-divisions for the purser, the surgeon, and his mates.

Harris.

COCK'SCOMB. n. s. [cock and comb.] A plant.

COCK'SHEAD. n. s. A plant, named also sainfoins.

Miller.

COCKSHUT.† n. s. [from cock and shut.] The close of the evening, at which time poultry go to roost, Dr. Johnson says. Minshew calls it twilight, either in the morning, or the evening. See Minsh. In TWILIGHT. In like manner cock-leet (cock-light) is day-break, and sometimes the dusk of the evening, in some parts of the west of England.

Surrey and himself,

Much about cockshut time, from troop to troop,

Went through the army.

Shakspeare.

COCKSPUR. n. s. Virginian hawthorn. A species of medlar. Miller.

COCKSURE.† adj. Confidently certain; without fear or diffidence. A word of contempt, Dr. Johnson says. But it seems not to have been used as such originally; but in the present sense of safe, sure, beyond doubt or danger. The word is also not an adverb as Dr. Johnson states, but an adjective. See, under SURE, To make sure.

While's the red hat doth endure,

He maketh himself cocksure;

The red hat with his hure

Bringeth all things under cure.

Skellon.

A few priests, men in white rochets, ruled all; who with setting up of six-foot roods, and rebuilding of rood-lofts, thought to make all cocksure.

Sir T. Smith, Orat. IV. Append. to his Life.

We steal, as in a castle, cocksure.

Shakspeare.

I thought myself cocksure of his horse, which he readily promised me. Pope, Letters.

COCKSWAIN.† n. s. [cozzypaine; Saxon.] The officer who has the command of the cockboat. Corruptly COXON.

Their majesties, lord Carteret, and Sir John Norris, embarked in Sir John's barge, and his captain steered the boat as cockswain.

Drummond's Travels, p. 70.

COCKWEED. n. s. [from cock and weed.] The name of a plant, called also Dittander, or Peppervort.

CO'COA. n. s. [cacaotal, Span. and therefore more properly written cacao.]

A species of palm-tree, cultivated in the East and West Indies. The bark of the nut is made into cordage, and the shell into drinking bowls. The kernel affords them a wholesome food, and the milk contained in the shell a cooling liquor. The leaves are used for thatching their houses, and are wrought into baskets. Miller.

The cacao or chocolate nut is a fruit of an oblong figure, is composed of a thin but hard and woody coat or skin, of a dark blackish colour; and of a dry kernel, filling up its whole cavity, fleshy, dry, firm, and fattish to the touch, of a dusky colour, an agreeable smell, and a pleasant and peculiar taste. It was unknown to us 'till the discovery of America. The tree is of the thickness of a man's leg, and but a few feet in height; its bark rough, and full of tubercles; and its leaves six or eight inches long, half as much in breadth, and pointed at the ends. The flowers are succeeded by the fruit, which is large and oblong, resembling a cucumber, five, six, or eight inches in length, and three or four in thickness, when fully ripe, of a purple colour. Within the cavity of this fruit are lodged the cocoa nuts, usually about thirty in number. Hill's Mat. Medica.

Amid' those orchards of the sun,
Give me to drain the cocoa's milky bowl,
And from the palm to draw its fresh'ning wine. Thomson.

CO'CTILE. adj. [coctilis, Lat.] Made by baking, as a brick.

CO'CTION. n. s. [coctio, Lat.] The act of boiling.

The disease is sometimes attended with expectoration from the lungs, and that is taken off by a coction and resolution of the feverish matter, or terminates in suppurations or a gangrene. Arbuthnot on Diet.

COD.† } n. s. [aselhus.] A sea fish.

CO'DFISH. } n. s. [aselhus.] A sea fish.
She that in wisdom ever was so frail,
To change the cod's head for the salmon's tail. Shakespeare, Othello.

COD.† n. s. [cobbe, Sax.]

1. Any case or husk in which seeds are lodged.

I remember the wooing of a peascod instead of her; from whom I took two cods, and giving her them again, said, Wear these for my sake. Shakespeare, As you Like it.

Thy corn thou there may'st safely sow,
Where in full cods last year rich pease did grow. May.
They let pease lie in small heaps as they are reaped, 'till they find the hawn and cod dry. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. A pillow. [Goth. kodde; Sax. cobbe; cæpean on his mycele cobbe, to consult his pillow. Sax. Chron. Lye, edit. Manning.] The word is yet used in the north of England for a cushion or pillow.

To COD. v. n. [from the noun.] To inclose in a cod.

All codded grain being a destroyer of weeds, an improver of land, and a preparer of it for other crops. Mortimer.

CO'DDERS. n. s. [from cod.] Gatherers of pease. Dict.

CO'DDY.* adj. [from cod.] Husky. Sherwood.

CO'DGER.* n. s. [perhaps from the Span. coger, "to gather, to get as he can," Minshew; whence cogedor, a gatherer. Laf. colligere.] Contemptuously used for a miser, one who rakes together all he can.

CODE. n. s. [codex, Lat.]

1. A book.

2. A book of the civil law.

We find in the Theodosian and Justinian code the interest of trade very well provided for. Arbuthnot on Coins.

Indentures, covenants, articles they draw,
Large as the fields themselves; and larger far
Than civil codes with all their glosses are. Pope, Sat.

CO'DICIL. n. s. [codicillus, Lat.] An appendage to a will.

The man suspects his lady's crying,
Was but to gain him to appoint her,
By codicil, a larger jointure. Prior.

COD'ILLE. n. s. [codille, Fr. codillo, Span.] A term at ombre, when the game is won.

She sees, and trembles at the approaching ill,
Just in the jaws of ruin, and codille. Pope, Rape of the Lock.

To COD'LE.† v. a. [coquo, coctulo, Lat. Skinner.]
To parboil; to soften by the heat of water.

Dear prince Pippin,
Down with your noble blood; or, as I live,
I'll have you codled. Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

To CO'DLE.* v. a. [perhaps from the old Fr. cadeler, to breed up tenderly; or a corruption of coll. See To COLL.] To make much of.

CO'DLING.† n. s. [from To codle.] An apple, generally codled, to be mixed with milk, Dr. Johnson says; and, it may be added, an apple not quite ripe. The fruit, at present styled a codling, is said to have been unknown to our gardens in the time of queen Elizabeth.

In July come gilliflowers of all varieties, early pears and plums in fruit, gennitings and codlings. Bacon, Essays.
Not yet old enough for a man, nor young enough for a boy; as a squash is before 'tis a peascod, or a codling when 'tis almost an apple. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Their entertainment at the height,
In cream and codlings rev'ling with delight. King's Cookery.
He let it lie all winter in a gravel walk, south of a codling hedge. Mortimer, Husbandry.

A codling, ere it went his lip in,
Won'd strait become a golden pippin. Swift.

COEFFICACY. n. s. [con and efficacia, Lat.] The power of several things acting together to produce an effect.

We cannot in general infer the efficacy of those stars, or coefficient particular in medications. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COEFFICIENCY. n. s. [con and efficio, Lat.] Cooperation; the state of acting together to some single end.

The managing and carrying on of this work, by the spirit's instrumental coefficient, requires, that they be kept together, without distinction or dissipation. Glanville, Sccepsis.

COEFFICIENT.† n. s. [con and efficiens, Lat.]

1. That which unites its action with the action of another.

2. [In algebra.] Such numbers, or given quantities, that are put before letters, or unknown quantities, into which letters they are supposed to be multiplied, and so do make a rectangle, or product with the letters; as 4 a, b x, c xx; where 4 is the coefficient of 4 a; b of b x, and c of c xx. Chambers.

3. In fluxions.

The coefficient of any generating term (in fluxions) is the quantity arising by the division of that term, by the generated quantity. Chambers.

From thence are derived rules for obtaining the fluxions of all other products and powers; be the coefficients or the indexes what they will, integers or fractions, rational or surd. Bp. Berkely, Analyst, § ix.

COEFFICIENTLY.* adv. [from coefficient.] In a co-operating manner.

COE'LDER.* n. s. [from con and elder.] An elder of the same rank.

The elders which are among you I exhort, who also am an elder, 1 Pet. v. 1. He exhorts, not commands: He also is an elder, i. e. as others are. In the original it is συμμελεβετερος, coelder.

Trapp's Popery truly stated, P. i. § 3.

CO'ELIACK Passion.* [old Fr. coeliacue, from Gr. κοιλια, the belly.] A diarrhoea, or flux, that arises from the indigestion or putrefaction of food in the stomach and bowels, whereby the aliment comes away little altered from what it was when eaten, or changed like corrupted stinking flesh. Quincy.

CEMETERY. See CEMETERY.

COEMPTION. n. s. [coemptio, Lat.] The act of buying up the whole quantity of any thing.

Monopolies and coemption of wares for resale, where they are not restrained, are great means to enrich. Bacon, Essays.

CENOBY.* See CENOBY.

To COENJOY.* v. a. [from con and enjoy.] * To enjoy together.

I wish my soul no other felicity, when she hath shaken off these rags of flesh, than to ascend to his, and co-enjoy the same bliss.

Howell, Lett. i. vi. 7.

COEQUAL. adj. [from con and equalis, Lat.] Equal; being of the same rank or dignity with another.

Henry the Fifth did sometime prophecy,
If once he came to be a cardinal,
He'll make his cap coequal with the crown.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

COEQUA'LITY.* n. s. [from coequal.] The state of being equal.

The co-equality and co-eternity of the Son with the Father was denied.

Hooker, Eccl. Pol.

The Unity in Trinity, and the Trinity in Unity is to be worshipped; namely, on account of their perfect co-eternity and co-equality.

Waterland on the Ath. Creed.

To COERCE. v. a. [coerceo, Lat.] To restrain; to keep in order by force.

Punishments are manifold, that they may coerce this profigate sort.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

COERCIBLE. adj. [from coerce.]

1. That may be restrained.
2. That ought to be restrained.

COER'CION.* n. s. [old Fr. cohercion, coërtion.] Penal restraint; check.

The coercion or execution of the sentence in ecclesiastical courts, is only by excommunication of the person contumacious.

Hale, Common Law.

Government has coercion and animadversion upon such as neglect their duty; without which coercive power, all government is toothless and precarious.

South.

COERCIVE. adj. [from coerce.]

1. That which has the power of laying restraint.
All things on the surface spread, are bound
By their coercive vigour to the ground. Blackmore.
2. That which has the authority of restraining by punishment.
For ministers to seek that themselves might have coercive power over the church, would have been hardly construed.

Hooker, Preface.

The virtues of a general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful command, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well as justice.

Dryden.

COESSENTIAL. adj. [con and essentia, Lat.] Participating of the same essence.

The Lord our God is but one God, in which indivisible unity we adore the Father, as being altogether of himself; we glorify that consubstantial word which is the Son; we bless and magnify that coessential Spirit eternally proceeding from both, which is the Holy Ghost

Hooker.

COESSENTIA'LITY.* n. s. [from coessential.] Participation of the same essence.

The appellation of the Son of God, assumed by him, [Christ,] implies the same kind of relation to him, as that of a man to his father; that is, it implies coessentiality with God, and therefore equality of nature, and consequently divinity in its full extent.

Burgess, Sermon on the Divinity of Christ, (1790,) p. 41.

COESSE'NTIALLY.* adv. [from coessential.] In a co-essential manner.

COESTA'BLISHMENT.* n. s. [from con and establish.] Joint establishment.

The morals of the community will be better secured by an exclusive establishment, at the publick expence, of the teachers of one sect, than by a coestablishment of the teachers of different sects of christians.

Bp. of Landaff's (Watson's) Charge, (1791,) p. 11.

COETA'NEAN.* n. s. [from con and etnas.] One of the same time or age with another.

Old major Stansby, of Hamt, a most intimate friend and neighbour, and coetanean of the late earle of Southampton.

Aubrey, Anecd. of Sir W. Raleigh, ii. 516.

COETA'NEOUS. adj. [con and etnas, Lat.] Of the same age with another: with to.

Eye was old as Adam, and Cain their son coetaneous unto both.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Every fault hath penal effects, coetaneous to the act.

Government of the Tongue, § 6.

Through the body every member sustains another; and all are coetaneous, because none can subsist alone.

Bentley, Sermon.

COETE'RNAL.* adj. [old Fr. coëternel, from con and eternas, Lat.] Equally eternal with another.

Or of the eternal coeternal beam!

Milton, P. L.

COETE'RNALLY. adv. [from coeternal.] In a state of equal eternity with another.

Arius had dishonoured his coeternally begotten Son.

Hooker, v. § 52.

COETE'RNITY.* n. s. [from coeternal.] Having existence from eternity equal with another eternal being.

The eternity of the Son's generation, and his coeternity and consubstantiality with the Father, when he came down from heaven, and was incarnate.

Hammond, Fundamentals.

Vain therefore was that opinion of a real matter coeval with God as necessary for production of the world by way of subject, as the Eternal and Almighty God by way of efficient.— This coeternity of matter opposeth God's independency.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. I.

COE'VAL. adj. [coævus, Lat.]

1. Of the same age.

Even his teeth and white, like a young flock,
Coeval, and new shorn, from the clear brook
Recent.

Prior.

2. Of the same age with another: followed by with.

This religion cannot pretend to be coeval with man.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

The monthly revolutions of the moon, or the diurnal of the earth upon its own axis, by the very hypothesis are coeval with the former.

Bentley.

Silence! coeval with eternity;

Thou wert, ere nature first began to be:

'Twas one vast nothing all, and all slept fast in thee! Pope.

3. Sometimes by to.

Although we had no monuments of religion ancienter than idolatry, we have no reason to conclude, that idolatrous religion was coeval to mankind.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

COE'VAL.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A contemporary; but properly one not only living at the same time, but of the same time of life.

Even Tully himself was taunted at by his coevals.

Hakewill on Providence, p. 29.

As it were not enough to have outdone all your coevals in wit, you will excel them in good nature.

Pope.

COE'VOUS. adj. [coævus, Lat.] One of the same age.

Then it should not have been the first, as supposing some other things coerous to it. South, Sermon.

To COEXIST. v. n. [con and existo, Lat.]

1. To exist at the same time.

The three stars that coexist in heavenly constellations, are a multitude of stars. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Of substances no one has any clear idea, farther than of certain simple ideas coexisting together. Locke.

2. Followed by with.

It is sufficient that we have the idea of the length of any regular periodical appearances, which we can in our minds apply to duration, with which the motion or appearance never coexisted. Locke.

COEXISTENCE. n. s. [from coexist.]

1. Having existence at the same time with another: with to.

Locke, who in the preceding lines has coexisted with, has here coexistence to.

The measuring of any duration, by some motion, depends not on the real coexistence of that thing to that motion, or any other periods of revolution. Locke.

2. More commonly followed by with.

We can demonstrate the being of God's eternal ideas, and their coexistence with him. Grew, Cosmol.

COEXISTENT. adj. [from coexist.]

1. Having existence at the same time with another: with to.

To the measuring the duration of any thing by time, it is not requisite that that thing should be coexistent to the motion we measure by, or any other periodical revolution. Locke.

2. Sometimes with.

This proves no antecedent necessity, but coexistent with the act. Bp. Bramhall, Answer to Hobbes.

Time is taken for so much of duration as is coextant with the motions of the great bodies of the universe. Locke.

All that one point is either future or past, and no parts are coexistent or contemporary with it. Bentley.

To COEXTEND. v. a. [con and extendo, Latin.] To extend to the same space or duration with another.

Every motion is, in some sort, coextended with the body moved. Grew, Cosmol.

Has your English language one single word that is coextended through all these significations? Bentley, Phil. Laps. ii. § 35.

COEXTENSION. n. s. [from coextend.] The act or state of extending to the same space or duration with another.

Though it be a spirit, I find it is no inconvenience to have some analogy, at least of coextension, with my body. Hale.

COEXTENSIVE.  adj.* [from con and extensive.] Having the same extent.

The object of the society are coextensive with the true spirit of christian charity. Bp. Winchester, (North.) Sermon. (1790.)

COEXTENSIVELY.  adv.* [from coextensive.] In a coextensive manner.

COFFEE. † n. s. [It is originally Arabick, pronounced caheu by the Turks, and cahuah by the Arabs; and by us formerly written coffia, and cauphé. See Blount's Voyage to the Levant, p. 27, and Burton's Anat. of Mel. p. 397. See also COFFEE-HOUSE.] The tree is a species of Arabick jessamine.

It is found to succeed as well in the Caribbee islands as in their native place of growth: but whether the coffee produced in the West Indies will prove as good as that from Mocha in Arabia Felix, time will discover. Miller.

Coffee denotes a drink prepared from the berries, very familiar in Europe for these eighty years, and among the Turks for one hundred and fifty. Thence, the traveller, was the first who brought it into France; and a Greek servant, called Pasqua, brought into England by Mr. Daniel Edwards, a Turkey merchant, in 1652, to make his coffee, first set up the profession of coffeeman, and introduced the drink among us. Chambers.

They have in Turkey a drink called coffee, made of a berry of the same name, as black as soot, and of a strong scent, but not aromatical; which they take, beaten into powder, in water, as hot as they can drink it. This drink comforteth the brain and heart, and helpeth digestion. Bacon.

To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
Or o'er cold coffee trifle with the spoon. Pope.

COFFEEHOUSE. † n. s. [coffee and house.] A house of entertainment where coffee is sold, and the guests are supplied with newspapers. Burton is one of the earliest users of this compound. Coffee, however, was still a novelty in England so late as 1650, as the remark of Anthony Wood shews.

They [the Turks] spend much time in those coffu-houses, which are somewhat like our alehouses and taverns.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 397.

This year (1650) Jacob a Jew opened a coffee house at the Angel in the parish of St. Peter in the East, Oxon; and there it was by some, who delighted in novelties, drank.

Life of A. Wood, p. 65.

At ten, from coffeehouse or play,
Returning, finishes the day. Prior.

It is a point they do not concern themselves about, further than perhaps as a subject in a coffeehouse. Say?

COFFEEMAN. n. s. [coffee and man.] One that keeps a coffeehouse.

Consider your enemies the Laodemonians; did ever you hear that they preferred a coffeman to Agesilaus? Addison.

COFFEEPOT. † n. s. [coffee and pot.] The covered pot in which coffee is boiled; or the pot into which the coffee, when boiled, is poured.

It is doubtless as hard to make a coffee-pot shine in poetry, as a plough. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

COFFER. † n. s. [coppe, Saxon; coffe, old Fr. a chest; Lat. coffinus; Gr. κόφινος, a basket.]

1. A chest generally for keeping money.

Two iron coffers hung on either side,
With precious metal full as they could hold. Spenser, F. Q.

The lining of his coffers shall make coats
To deck our soldiers for these Irish wars. Shakespeare, Rich. II.

If you destroy your governour that is wealthy, you must close another, who will fill his coffers out of what is left. L'Estrange.

2. Treasure.

He would discharge it without any burthen to the queen's coffers, for honour sake. Bacon, Advice to Valiers.

3. [In architecture.] A square depression in each interval between the modillions of the Corinthian cornice, usually filled with some enrichment.

Chambers.

4. [In fortification.] A hollow lodgement across a dry moat, from six to seven foot deep, and from sixteen to eighteen broad; the upper part being made of pieces of timber, raised two foot above the level of the moat; which little elevation has hurdles laden with earth for its covering, and serves as a parapet with embrasures. Chambers.

To COFFER. † v. a. [old Fr. coffier.] To treasure up in chests.

Treasure, as a war might draw forth, so a peace succeeding might coffer up. Bacon, Henry VII.

COFFERER.  n. s.* [from coffer.] He who places treasure in a chest or coffer.

Ye fortune's coffers, ye powers of wealth,
You do your rent-rolls most felonious wrong!

Young, Night Th. 2.

CO'FFERER of the King's Household.† n. s. A principal officer of his majesty's court, next under the comptroller, that, in the comptinghouse and elsewhere, hath a special oversight of other officers of the household, for their good demeanour in their offices.

Coxcel.

He [Sir T. Pope] is likewise said to have been appointed cofferer to the household. Warton, Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 41.

CO'FFIN.† n. s. [coffin, Fr. cophinus, Lat. κόφινος, Gr. a basket; which is the ancient application of our word. "Yit understonden not ye, neither han mynde of fyve looves unto fyve thousynde men; and how many coffyns ye taken?" Wicliffe, St. Matt. xvi. Barret writes the word cophin, under BIER.]

1. The box or chest in which dead bodies are put into the ground. It is used both of wood and other matter.

He went as if he had been the coffin that carried himself to his sepulchre. Sidney.

Not a flower sweet
On my black coffin let there be strown.

Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

One fate they have,
The ship their coffin, and the sea their grave. Waller.
The joiner is fitting screws to your coffin. Swift.

2. A mould of paste for a pye.
Of the paste a coffin will I rear,
And make two pasties of your shameful heads. Titus Andron.
3. A paper case, in form of a cone, used by grocers.
4. In farriery.

COFFIN of a horse, is the whole hoof of the foot above the coronet, including the coffin bone. The coffin bone is a small spongy bone, inclosed in the midst of the hoof, and possessing the whole form of the foot. Farrier's Dict.

To CO'FFIN.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To inclose in a coffin.
Would'st thou have laugh'd, had I come coffin'd home,
That weep'd to see me triumph? Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Let me lie
In prison, and here be coffin'd, when I die. Donne.

2. Simply, to enclose; to confine.
Devotion is not coffin'd in a cell,
Nor chok'd by wealth. John Hall, Poems, (1646,) p. 59.

3. To cover, as with paste for a pye. See COFFIN.
And coffin'd in crust 'till now she was hoary.
B. Jonson, Masque of Gipsies Metamorph.

CO'FFINMAKER. n. s. [coffin and maker.] One whose trade is to make coffins.

Where will be your sexton, coffinmakers, and plumbers?
Tatler.

COFO'UNDER.* n. s. A joint founder.

The ancestors of sir E. Sackville, knight of the Bath and earl of Dorset, were great benefactors, or rather cofounders of this religious structure. Weever, Fun. Monum. p. 613.

COG.* n. s. See To Cog. A piece of deceit; prevarication; trick.

So letting it pass for an ordinary cog amongst them, a half-witted man may see there is nothing makes for them or their advantage.

Watson's Quodlibets of Religion and State, (1602,) p. 338.

To COG.† v. a. [A word of uncertain original, derived by Skinner from coquelinus, French; by Lye from cogge. See To COAX.]

1. To flatter; to wheedle; to sooth by adulatory speeches.

I'll mountebank their loves,
Cog their hearts from them, and come home belov'd
Of all the trades in Rome. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

He plays the most notorious hobby-horse, jesting and frisking in the luxury of his nonsense with such poor fetches to cog a liar, after from us. Milton, Colasterion.

But if some fortune cog them into love,
In what a fifteenth sphere then do they move!

John Hall, Poems, (1646,) p. 11.

To Cog a die. To secure it, so as to direct its fall; to falsify.

Notwithstanding this cogged number of his provincial synods, and private decrees, (as Volusion terms them,) all the time of the first 700 years, the freedom of this practice continued in many parts of the Christian world.

Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Married Clergy, p. 248.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dexterously to throw the lucky dice. Dryden, Pers. Sat.

For guineas in other men's breeches,
Your gamblers will palm and will cog. Swift.

Ye gallants of Newgate, whose fingers are nice
In diving in pockets, or cogging of dice. Swift.

Bp. Hall, Hon. of Married Clergy, iii. § 2.

CO'GGLESTONE. n. s. [cuogolo, Ital.] A little stone; a small pebble. Skinner.

CO'GNABLE. adj. [from cogito, Latin.] That which may be thought on; what may be the subject of thought.

TO CO'GITATE.† v. n. [cogito, Lat.] To think. As the life of the body is entertained in still cogitating, so is our spirit nourished in reducing to memory her functions.

Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633,) p. 101.

COGITATION. n. s. [cogitatio, Latin.]

1. Thought; the act of thinking.

Having their cogitations darkened, and being strangers from the life of God, from the ignorance which is in them. Hooker.

A picture puts me in mind of a friend; the intention of the mind in seeing, is carried to the object represented, which is no more than simple cogitation or apprehension of the person.

Stillinger.

This Descartes proves, that brutes have no cogitation, because they could never be brought to signify their thoughts by any artificial signs.

Ray on the Creation.

These powers of cogitation, and volition, and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion and modification of it.

Bentley.

2. Purpose; reflection previous to action.

The king, perceiving that his desires were intemperate, and his cogitations vast and irregular, began not to brook him well.

Bacon, Henry VII.

3. Meditation; contemplation; mental speculation.

On some great charge employ'd
He seem'd, or fixt in cogitation deep.

Milton, P. L.

CO'GITATIVE.† adj. [from cogito, Latin.]

1. Having the power of thought and reflection.

And though the philosophers have usually distinguished them into more, as into the common sense, the phansie, both estimative, and cogitative; yet really and truly they are but one.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 42.

If these powers of cogitation and sensation are neither inherent in matter, nor acquirable to matter, they proceed from some cogitative substance, which we call spirit and soul.

Bentley.

2. Given to thought and deep meditation.

The earl had the closer and more reserved countenance, being by nature somewhat more cogitative.

Wotton, Parallel of Lords Essex and Buckingham.

CO'GNATE.* adj. [Lat. cognatus.] Kindred; partaking of the same nature.

Which atoms are still hovering up and down, and never rest till they meet with some pores proportionable and cognate to their figures, where they acquiesce. Howell, Lett. iv. 50.

Some neuter cognate substantive.

Johnson's Notes Nottinghamianæ, p. 82.

Imbrute, I believe, is a word of Milton's coinage. So was the cognate compound "imparadised" supposed to be, till Bentley brought an instance from Sidney's Arcadia.

Warton, Notes on Milton's Smaller Poems.

COGNATION.† n. s. [cognatio, Latin; cognation, old Fr.]

1. Kindred; descent from the same original.

Much moved hereto upon the account of his cognition with the Æacides and kings of Molossus.

Sir T. Brown's Miscell. Tracts, p. 159.

As by our cognition to the body of the first Adam we took in death, so by our union with the body of the second Adam we shall have the inheritance of life.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. § 4.

Truth hath a cognition with the soul.

Cudworth, Serm. p. 81.

Two vices I shall mention, as being of near cognition to ingratitude, pride, and hard-heartedness, or want of compassion.

South.

Let the critics tell me what certain sense they could put upon either of these four words, by their mere cognition with each other.

Watts on the Mind.

2. Relation; participation of the same nature.

For as much as a priest is to have a cognition or conjunction of nature with those for whom he is to offer sacrifices.

South, Serm. viii. 275.

He induceth us to ascribe effects unto causes of no cognition.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COGNISE'E. n. s. [In law.] He to whom a fine in lands or tenements is acknowledged. Cowell.

COGNITION. n. s. [cognitio, Latin.] Knowledge; complete conviction.

I will not be myself nor have cognition
Of what I feel: I am all patience.

Shakspeare, Troil. and Cressida.

God, as he created all things, so is he beyond and in them all, not only in power, as under his subjection, or in his presence, as in his cognition; but in their very essence, as in the soul of their causalities.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'GNITIVE. adj. [from cognitus, Latin.] Having the power of knowing.

Unless the understanding employ and exercise its cognitive or apprehensive power about these terms, there can be no actual apprehension of them.

South, Serm.

CO'GNIZABLE. adj. [cognoisable, French.]

1. That falls under judicial notice.

2. Liable to be tried, judged, or examined.

Some are merely of ecclesiastical cognizance, others of a mixed nature, such as are cognizable both in the ecclesiastical and secular courts.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

CO'GNIZANCE.† n. s. [old Fr. cognizance.]

1. Judicial notice; trial; judicial authority.

It is worth the while, however, to consider how we may discountenance and prevent those evils which the law can take no cognizance of.

L'Estrange.

Happiness or misery, in converse with others, depends upon things which human laws can take no cognizance of.

South.

The moral crime is completed, there are only circumstances wanting to work it up for the cognizance of the law.

Addison.

2. A badge, by which any one is known.

And at the king's going away the earl's servants stood, in a seemly manner, in their livery coats, with cognizances, ranged on both sides, and made the king a bow.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

These were the proper cognizances and coat-arms of the tribes.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

All believing persons, and all churches congregated in the name of Christ, washed in the same laver of regeneration, eating of the same bread, and drinking of the same cup, are united in the same cognizance, and so known to be the same church.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. IX.

3. Knowledge by recollection. Not now in use.

Who, soon as on that knight his eye did glance,
Eftsoones of him had perfect cognizance.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. i. 31.

COGNOMINAL.† adj. [cognomen, Latin.]

1. Having the same name.

Nor do those animals more resemble the creatures on earth, than they on earth the constellations which pass under animal names in heaven; nor the dogfish at sea much more make out the dog of the land, than his cognominal or namesake in the heavens.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Belonging to the surname.

The first of these two [names] is Pontius, the name descended to him from the original of his family;—the second, Pilatus, as a cognominal addition distinguishing from the rest descending from the same original. Pearson on the Creed, Art. IV.

TO COGNO'MINATE.* v. a. [Lat. cognomino.] To give a name. Cockeram.

COGNOMINATION. n. s. [cognomen, Latin.]

1. A surname; the name of a family.

2. A name added from any accident or quality.

Pompey deserved the name Great: Alexander, of the same cognomination, was generalissimo of Greece. Brown.

COGNO'SCENCE.† n. s. [old Fr. cognoissance, from cognosco, Latin.] Knowledge; the state or act of knowing. Dict.

And yet of that near object have no cognoscence.

More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 51.

COGNO'SCIBLE.† adj. [cognosco, Latin.]

1. That may be known; being the object of knowledge.

In matters cognoscible, and framed for our disquisition, our industry must be our oracle.

Sir T. Brown's Miscell. Tracts, p. 179.

God is naturally cognoscible by inartificial means.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 546.

The same that is said for the redundancy of matters intelligible and cognoscible in things natural, may be applied to things artificial. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

2. That falls under judicial notice.

When a witness is called before a judge, to give evidence upon oath concerning a third person, in a matter cognoscible by that jurisdiction, he is bound to swear in truth, in judgement, and in righteousness.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. ii. C. 5.

Here the mayor and magistrates of Gloucester did that which was no way warrantable by their charter, in which case they may be accountable, all or some: but in the high-commission we meddled with no cause not cognoscible there.

Afp. Laud's Diary, &c. i. 333.

COGNO'SCITIVE.* adj. [old Fr. cognoscitive.] Having the power of knowing.

I suppose prescience to be an act of the understanding, (as likewise all science,) which alone is cognoscitive.

Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 573.

TO COHA'BIT.† v. n. [cohabito, Latin.]

1. To dwell with another in the same place.

The Philistines were worsted by the captivated ark, which foraged their country more than a conquering army: they were not able to cohabit with that holy thing. South.

2. To live together as husband and wife.

He knew her not to be his own wife, and yet had a design to cohabit with her as such. Fiddes, Sermons.

COHA'BITANT.† n. s. [from cohabit.] An inhabitant of the same place.

We receive fashions and condicions of our companions; and as diseases pass from one bodie to another by touching, even so doth the wind pour her infection into her neighbour. The drunkard leadeth his guests into drunkenness. Effeminate men and softlings cause the stout man to wax tender. Covetousness transferreth her poison into cohabitants.

Woolton's Christian Manual, (1576), L. 6.^b

The oppressed Indians protest against that heaven where the Spaniards are to be their cohabitants. Decay of Piety.

COHABITATION.† n. s. [from cohabit.]

1. The act or state of inhabiting the same place with another.

Nestorius granted two natures in Christ, yet not, as you saie, from his nativitie, nor by adunation, but by cohabitation or inhabitation, so that he made but one Christ.

Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner, p. 353.

There shall be a cohabitation of the spirit with flesh, in a mystical or moral sense. More, Conj. Cabbalist, p. 218.

Those colonies and legions that had so long cohabitation and coalition with them. Howell, Instruct. for Trav. p. 147.

They agreed together, by pacts and covenants, neither to do nor suffer injury; but to submit to rules of equality, and make laws by compact; in order to their peaceable cohabitation.

Hallywell's Excell. of Moral Virtue, p. 79.

2. The state of living together as married persons.

Which defect, though it could not evacuate a marriage after cohabitation, and actual consummation, yet it was enough to make void a contract. Bacon, Hen. VII.

But how the peace and perpetual cohabitation of marriage can be kept, how that benevolent and intimate communion of body can be held with one that must be hated with a most operative hatred, must be forsaken, and yet continually dwelt with and accompanied.

Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

Monsieur Brumars, at one hundred and two years, died for love of his wife, who was ninety-two at her death, after seventy years cohabitation. Taller, No. 56.

COHE'IR. n. s. [coheres, Lat.] One of several among whom an inheritance is divided.

Married persons, and widows and virgins, are all coheirs in the inheritance of Jesus, if they live within the laws of their estate. Bp. Taylor's Holy Living.

COHE'IRESS.† n. s. [from coheir.] A woman who has an equal share of an inheritance with other women.

Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, in default of male issue, made his three sisters coheiresses. Ashmole, Berk. ii. 276.

TO COHE'RE.† v. n. [old Fr. coherer, Lat. co-haereo.]

1. To stick together; to hold fast one to another, as parts of the same mass.

Two pieces of marble, having their surface exactly plain, polite, and applied to each other in such a manner as to intercept the air, do cohere firmly together as one. Woodward.

We find that the force, whereby bodies cohere, is very much greater when they come to immediate contact, than when they are at ever so small a finite distance. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

None want a place for all their center found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around;
Not closer, orb in orb conglomb'd, are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky Queen. Pope, Dunciad.

2. To be well connected; to follow regularly in the order of discourse.

They have been inserted, where they best seemed to cohere.

Burke, Thoughts on Scarcity, Pref.

3. To suit; to fit; to be fitted to.

Had time coher'd with place, or place with wishing.

Shakspeare.

4. To agree.

He [Vortigern] was at length burnt in his tower by fire from Heaven, at the prayer, as some say, of German; but that coheres not; as others, by Ambrosius Aurelianus.

Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. iii.

COHE'RENCE. } n. s. [coherencia, Latin.]

COHE'RENCY. }

1. That state of bodies in which their parts are joined together, from what cause soever it proceeds, so that they resist divulsion and separation; nor can be separated by the same force by which they might be simply moved, or being only laid upon one another, might be parted again. Quincy.

The pressure of the air will not explain, nor can be a cause of the coherence of the particles of air themselves. Locke.

Matter is either fluid or solid; words that may comprehend the middle degrees between extreme fixedness and coherency, and the most rapid intestine motion. Bentley.

2. Connection; dependency; the relation of parts or things one to another.

It shall be no trouble to find each controversy's resting place, and the coherence it hath with things, either on which it dependeth, or which depend on it. Hooker, Preface.

Why between sermons and faith should there be ordinarily that coherence, which causes have with their usual effects?

Hooker.

3. The texture of a discourse, by which one part follows another regularly and naturally.
4. Consistency in reasoning, or relating, so that one part of the discourse does not destroy or contradict the rest.

Coherence of discourse, and a direct tendency of all the parts of it to the argument in hand, are most eminently to be found in him. Locke, Preface to St. Paul's Epistles.

COHERENT, adj. [coherens, Latin.]

1. Sticking together, so as to resist separation.
By coagulating and diluting, that is, making their part more of thems coherent. Arbuthnot on Aliments.
Where all must full, or not coherent be;
And all that rises, rise in due degree. Pope, Essay on Man.
2. Connected; united.
The mind proceeds from the knowledge it stands possessed of already, to that which lies next and is coherent to it, and so on to what it aims at. Locke.
3. Suitable to something else; regularly adapted.
Instruct my daughter,
That time and place, with this deceit so lawful,
May prove coherent. Shakespeare, All's well that ends well.
4. Consistent; not contradictory to itself.
A coherent thinker, and a strict reasoner, is not to be made at once by a set of rules. Watts, Logic.

COHESION, n. s. [old Fr. coesion.]

1. The act of sticking together.
Hard particles, heaped together, touch in a few points, and must be separable by less force than breaks a solid particle, whose parts touch in all the space between them, without any pores or interstices to weaken their cohesion. Newton's Opt.
Solids and fluids differ in the degree of cohesion, which, being increased, turns a fluid into a solid. Arbuthnot on Aliments.
2. The state of union or inseparability.
What cause of their cohesion can you find?
What props support, what chains the fabrick bind? Blackmore.
3. Connection; dependence.
In their tender years, ideas that have no natural cohesion, come to be united in their heads. Locke.

COHESIVE, adj. [from cohere.] That has the power of sticking to another, and of resisting separation.

COHESIVELY, adv. [from cohesive.] In a connected or dependent manner.

COHESIVENESS, n. s. [from cohesive.] The quality of being cohesive: the quality of resisting separation.

To COHIBIT, v. a. [cohibeo, Lat.] To restrain; to hinder. Dict.

To COHOBATE, v. a. To, pour the distilled liquor upon the remaining matter, and distil it again.

The juices of an animal body are, as it were, cobobated, being excreted and admitted again into the blood with the fresh aliment. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Pour upon it [powder of antimony] the rectified oil, which abstract and cobobate seven times, till such time as the powder has imbibed all the oil, and is quite dry.

Greenhill, Art of Embalming, (1705,) p. 354.

COHOBATION, n. s. [from cobobate.] A returning any distilled liquor again upon what it was drawn from, or upon fresh ingredients of the same kind, to have it more impregnated with their virtues.

Quincy.
Cohobation is the pouring the liquor distilled from any thing back upon the remaining matter, and distilling it again. Locke.

This oil, dulcified by cobobation with an aromatized spirit, is of use to restore the sensitive faculty. Grew's Museum.

COHORT, n. s. [cohorte, old Fr. cohors, Lat.]

1. A troop of soldiers in the Roman armies, containing about five hundred foot.

The Romans levied as many cohorts, companies, and ensigns from hence as from any of their provinces. Camden.

2. [In poetical language.] A body of warriors.

The arch-angelick Power prepar'd
For swift descent; with him the cohort bright
Of watchful Cherubim. Milton, P. I.

Here Churchill, not so prompt
To vaunt as fight, his hardy cohorts join'd
With Eugene. Philips, Blenheim.

COHORTATION, n. s. [cohortatio, Lat.] Encouragement by words; incitement. Dict.

COIFF, n. s. [coiffe, Fr. from cofca, for cucufa, low Lat.] The head-dress; a lady's cap; the serjeant's cap.

The judges of the four circuits in Wales, although they are not of the first magnitude, nor need be of the degree of the coif, yet are they considerable. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

No less a man than a brother of the coif began his suit, before he had been a twelvemonth at the Temple. Addison, Spectator.

Instead of home-spun coifs were seen,
Good pinner's edg'd with colbertine. Swift.

To COIFF, v. a. [Fr. coiffer.] To dress with a coiff.

She is clothed like a nun, coiffed like a puppy, lame of one arm, crooked of one foot. Wodroephe, Fr. Gr. (1623,) p. 291.

Whilst wanton boys of Paphos' court
In myrtles hide my staff for sport,
And coiff me, where I'm bald, with flowers. Cooper.

COIFFED, adj. [Fr. coiffé.] Wearing a coiff.

It is from you, eloquent oyster-merchants of Billingsgate (just ready to be called to the bar, and coiffed like your sister-serjeants) that we expect the shortening of the time and lessening the expences of law-suits. Arbuthnot and Pope, Martin Scrib.

COIFFURE, n. s. [coiffure, Fr.] Head-dress.

His head was adorned with a royal bonnet, upon which was set a mitre of incomparable beauty, together drawing up the coiffure to a highness royal.

Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633,) p. 68.

I am pleased with the coiffure now in fashion, and think it shews the good sense of the valuable part of the sex. Addison.

COIGNE, n. s. [An Irish term, as it seems.] See To COIGNE.

Fitz Thomas of Desmond began that extortion of coigne and livery, and pay; that is, he and his army took horsecoat and man's meat, and money, at pleasure. Davies on Ireland.

I need not feare that any such unlawful exaction as coigne should be required at my hand.

Bryskett, Disc. of Civil Life, (1606,) p. 157.

To COIGNE, or COINY, v. n. [from the noun.] To live by extortion.

Though they came not armed like soldiers to be cessed upon me, yet their purpose was to coynic upon me, and to eat me out of house and home. Bryskett, Disc. of Civil Life, p. 157.

COIGNE, n. s. [old Fr. cogn; low Lat. cognus; Gr. γωνία, an angle; Irish, cuinne, a corner. Our word is now often written coin.

1. A corner.

No jutting frieze,
Buttrice, nor coigne of vantage, but this bird
Hath made his pendant bed. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

See you yond' coigne o' the capitol, yond' corner stone? Shakespeare, Coriol.

2. A wooden wedge used by printers.

To COIL, v. a. [old Fr. coillir, mod. cuellir; from the Lat. colligere, to gather.] To gather into a narrow compass; as to coil a rope, to wind it in a Coil'd up in a cable, like salt cels.

Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

The lurking particles of air so expanding themselves, must necessarily plump out the sides of the bladder, and so keep them turgid, until the pressure of the air, that at first coiled them, be readmitted to do the same thing again. Boyle.

Shun Folly's haunts, and vicious company,
Lest from true goodness they thy steps entice,
And Pleasure coil thee in her dangerous snare.

Edwards, Can. of Criticism, Sonn. xxxiv.

COIL. † n. s. [Teut. kollern or kolleren, to scold, from the idea of taking a person by the collar. Skinner. Fr. cuellir, Ital. cogliere, Lye. And hence from the noise made in coiling up any thing. But, as "to keep a coil" means to make a noise, the word has been referred to call, Heb. col, the voice. See Whiter's Etym. Mag.]

1. Tumult; turmoil; bustle; stir; hurry; confusion.

Who was so firm, so constant, that this coil
Would not infect his reason? Shakspeare, Tempest.
You, mistress, all this coil is 'long of you. Shakspeare.
In that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Your son and 't please you, Sir, is new cashiered yonder,
Cast from his mistress' favour; and such a coil there is;
Such fending, and such proving. Beaum. and Fl. Hum. Liout.

2. A rope wound into a ring.

COIN. n. s. [coigne, Fr.] A corner; any thing standing out angularly; a square brick cut diagonally; called often quoin or quinc.

COIN. † n. s. [by some imagined to come from cuneus, a wedge, because metal is cut in wedges to be coined, Dr. Johnson says. "A cudendo dictum cuset Cokus ad Littletonem, sect. 335. Alii à cunei figura, et probabilius." Du Cange. Fr. coin, Ital. conio.]

1. Money stamped with a legal impression.

He gave Dametas a good sum of gold in ready coin, which Menalcas had bequeathed. Sidney.

You have made
Your holy hat be stamp'd on the king's coin.

Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

I cannot tell how the poets will succeed in the explication of coins, to which they are generally very great strangers. Addison.
She now contracts her vast design,

And all her triumphs shrink into a coin. Pope.

2. Payment of any kind.

The loss of present advantage to flesh and blood, is repaid in a nobler coin. Hammond, Fundamentals.

To COIN. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To mint or stamp metals for money.

They cannot touch me for coining: I am the king. Shakspeare.
They never put in practice a thing so necessary as coined money is. Peacham of Antiquities.
Tenants cannot coin rent just at quarter-day, but must gather it by degrees. Locke.

Can we be sure that this medal was really coined by an artificer, or is but a product of the soil from whence it was taken? Bentley.

2. To make or invent.

My lungs
Coin words 'till their decay, against those measles,
Which we disdain should tetter us. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

3. To make or forge any thing, in an ill sense.

Never coin a formal lye on't,
To make the knight overcome the giant. Hudibras.
Those motives induced Virgil to coin his fable. Dryden.
Some tale, some new pretence, he daily coin'd,
To sooth his sister, and delude her mind. Dryden, Virgil.
A term is coined to make the conveyance easy. Atterbury.

CO'INAGE. n. s. [from coin.]

1. The art or practice of coining money.

The care of the coinage was committed to the inferior magistrates; and I don't find that they had a publick trial as we solemnly practise in this country. Arbutnot.

2. Coin: money; stamped and legitimated metal.

This is conceived to be a coinage of some Jews, in derision of Christians, who first began that portrait. Brown.

Moor was forced to leave off coining, by the great crowds of people continually offering to return his coinage upon him. Swift.

3. The charges of coining money.

4. New production; invention.

Unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival of words, runs into affectation; a fault to be avoided on either hand. Dryden, Juv. Ded.

5. Forgery; invention.

This is the very coinage of your brain;
This bodiless creation ecstasy
Is very cunning in. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

To COINCIDE. v. n. [coincido, Lat.]

1. To fall upon the same point; to meet in the same point.

If the equator and ecliptick had coincided, it would have rendered the annual revolution of the earth useless. Chryne.

2. To concur; to be consistent with.

The rules of right judgement, and of good ratiocination, often coincide with each other. Watts, Logic.

COINCIDENCE. n. s. [from coincide.]

1. The state of several bodies, or lines, falling upon the same point.

An universal equilibrium, arising from the coincidence of infinite centers, can never be naturally acquired. Bentley.

2. Concurrence; consistency; tendency of many things to the same end; occurrence of many things at the same time.

The very concurrence and coincidence of so many evidences that contribute to the proof, carries a great weight. Hale.

3. It is followed by with.

The coincidence of the planes of this rotation with one another, and with the plane of the ecliptick, is very near the truth. Chryne, Phil. Prin.

COINCIDENCY.* n. s. [from coincide.] Tendency of several things to the same end.

These be the eight kinds of St. Barnard's unity; wherein I will not censure either any impropriety, or any coincidence; because they may all well pass for several kinds of unity in the popular capacity. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 303.

COINCIDENT. adj. [from coincide.]

1. Falling upon the same point.

These circles I viewed through a prism; and as I went from them, they became nearer and nearer together, and at length became coincident. Newton, Opt.

2. Concurrent; consistent; equivalent: followed by with.

Christianity teaches nothing but what is perfectly suitable to and coincident with the ruling principles of a virtuous and well inclined man. South.

These words of our apostle are exactly coincident with that controverted passage in his discourse to the Athenians. Bentley.

COINCIDER.* n. s. [from coincide.] That which coincides with another thing.

From its [the verb's] readiness to coincide with its noun in completing the sentence, they [the Stoicks] called it συμβαση, a coincider. Harris's Hermes, i. § 9.

Something less than a coincider, or less than a predicable. Ibid.

COINCIDATION. n. s. [from con and indico, Latin.]

Many symptoms betokening the same cause.

CO'INER. n. s. [from coin.]

1. A maker of money; a minter; a stamper of coin.

My father was I know not where
When I was stamp'd: some coiner with his tools
Made me a counterfeit. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

It is easy to find designs that never entered into the thoughts of the sculptor or the coiner. Addison on Medals.

There are only two patents referred to, both less advantageous to the coiner than this of Wood. Swift.

2. A counterfeiter of the king's stamp; a maker of base money.
3. An inventor.

Dionysius, a Greek coiner of etymologies, is commended by Athenæus. Camden's Remains.

TO COINQUINATE.* v. a. [old Fr. coinquiner, Lat. coinquino.] To pollute; to defile; and also, to defame. Cotgrave.

That would coinquinate,
It would contaminate. Skelton, Poems, p. 199.

COINQUINATION.* n. s. [old Fr. coinquination.] Pollution; defilement. Cotgrave.

TO COJOIN. v. n. [conjungo, Lat.] To join with another in the same office.

Thou may'st cojoin with something, and thou dost,
And that beyond commission. Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

CO'ISTRIL. n. s. A coward; a runaway: corrupted from kestrel, a mean or degenerate hawk.

He's a coward and a coistril, that will not drink to my niece.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

COIT. n. s. [lote, a die, Dutch.] A thing thrown at a certain mark. See QUOIT.

The time they wear out at coits, kayles, or the like idle exercises. Curew, Surv. of Cornwall.

TO COIT.* v. a. [from the noun.] To throw any thing, as at the game of coits. Coit it to me, is yet used in the north of England.

COIT'ING.* n. s. [from coit.] The act of playing at coits. Some men would say that in mediocrity, which I have so much praised in shooting, why should not bowlyng, clasphe-pynnes, and coiting, be as much commended.

Sir T. Elyot, Govern. fol. 82. b.

COIT'ION. n. s. [coitio, Lat.]

1. Copulation; the act of generation. *

I cannot but admire that philosophers should imagine frogs to fall from the clouds, considering how openly they act their coition, produce spawn, tadpoles and frogs. Ray on Creation.

He is not made productive of his kind, but by coition with a female. Grew's Cosmol.

2. The act by which two bodies come together.

By Gilbertus this motion is termed coition, not made by any faculty attractive of one, but a syndrome and concurrence of each. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COJUROR.* n. s. [Lat. con and juror.] He who bears his testimony to the credibility of another.

The solemn forms of oaths: of a compurgator, or cojurator, which kind of oath was very much used by the Anglo-Saxons: The form of this oath is this: "I swear by God, that the oath which N. swore was honest and true."

Wotton's View of Hicler's Thesaur. by Skelton, p. 59.

COKE. n. s. [perhaps from coquo, Skinner.] Fewel made by burning pit-coal under earth, and quenching the cinders; as charcoal is made with wood. It is frequently used in drying malt.

CO'LANDER. n. s. [colo, to strain, Lat.] A sieve either of hair, twigs or metal, through which a mixture to be separated is poured, and which retains the thicker parts; a strainer.

Take a thick woven osier colander,
Through which the pressed wines are strained clear. May.

All the viscera of the body are but as so many colanders to separate several juices from the blood. Ray on the Creation.

The brains from nose and mouth, and either ear,
Came issuing forth, as through a colander
The curdled milk. Dryden.

COLATION. n. s. [from colo, Lat.] The art of filtering or straining.

CO'LATRE.* n. s. [old Fr. colature, from colo, Lat.]

1. The act of straining; filtration. Cotgrave.

The virtue thereof may be derived to it through a colature of natural earth. Evelyn.

2. The matter strained. Cotgrave.

CO'LBERTINE.* n. s. A kind of lace worn by women, Dr. Johnson says. It is termed "a lace resembling network, of the fabrick of Mons. Colbert, superintendant of the French king's manufactures," in the Fop's Dictionary of 1690.

Go, hang out an old frisoner gorget, with a yard of yellow colbertine again. Congreve's Way of the World.

Diff'rence rose between

Mechlin, the queen of lace, and Colbertine. Young.

CO'LCOTHAR. n. s. A term in chymistry.

Colcothar is the dry substance which remains after distillation, but commonly the caput mortuum of vitriol. Quincy.

Colcothar or vitriol burnt, though unto a redness, containing the fixed salt, will make good ink. Brown.

COLD.* adj. [kald, Goth. colb, Saxon; kalt, German; kaald, Dan. See also ACOLD.]

1. Not hot; not warm; gelid; wanting warmth; being without heat.

The aggregated soil

Death, with his mace petrified, cold, and dry,
As with a trident, smote. Milton, P. L.

The diet in the state of manhood ought to be solid; and their chief drink water cold, because in such a state it has its own natural spirit. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Causing sense of cold.

Bids us seek

Some better shroud, some better warmth, to cherish
Our limbs benumm'd, ere this diurnal star
Leave cold the night, how we his gather'd beams Reflected, may with matter sere foment. Milton, P. L.

3. Chill; shivering; having sense of cold.

O noble English, that could entertain,
With half their force, the full power of France;
And let another half stand laughing by,
All out of work, and cold for action. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

4. Having cold qualities; not volatile; not acrid.

Cold plants have a quicker perception of the heat of the sun than the hot herbs; as a cold hand will sooner find a little warmth than an hot. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

5. Indifferent; frigid; wanting passion; wanting zeal: without concern; unactive; unconcerned; wanting ardour. Hence the compound, and now frequent, expression, cold-hearted. See COLD-HEARTED.

There sprung up one kind of men, with whose zeal and forwardness the rest being compared, were thought to be marvellous cold and dull. Hooker, Preface.

Infinite shall be made cold in religion, by your example, that never were hurt by reading books. Ascham.

Temp'rately proceed to what you would
Thus violently redress.—Sir, these cold ways,
That seem like prudent helps, are very poisonous. Shakspeare.

New dated letters these,

Their cold intent, tenour and substance thus;
Here doth he wish his person, and his power,
The which he could not levy. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

We should not, when the blood was cold, have threat'ned
Our prisoners with the sword. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

To see a world in flames, and an host of angels in the clouds, one must be much of a stoick to be a cold and unconcerned spectator. Burnet, Pref. to Theory of the Earth.

No drum or trumpet needs

To inspire the coward, or to warm the cold,
His voice, his sole appearance, makes them bold. Dryden.

O, thou hast touch'd me with thy sacred theme,
And my cold heart is kindled at thy flame. Rowe.

A man must be of a very cold or degenerate temper, whose heart doth not burn within him in the midst of praise and adoration. Addison, Freucholder.

6. Unaffected; unable to move the passions.

What a deal of cold business doth a man mispend the better part of life in? In scattering compliments, tendering visits, following feasts and plays. B. Jonson.

The rabble are pleased at the first entry of a disguise; but the jest grows cold even with them too, when it comes on in a second scene. Addison on Itchy.

7. Reserved; coy; not affectionate; not cordial; not friendly.

Let his knights have colder looks.
Among you. Shakspeare, King Lear.

The commissioners grew more reserved and colder towards each other. Clarendon.

8. Chaste; not heated by vitious appetite.

You may
Convey your pleasures in a spacious plenty,
And yet seem cold, the time you may so hoodwink:
We've willing dames enough. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

9. Not welcome; not received with kindness or warmth of affection.

My master's suit will be but cold,
Since she respects my mistress' love.
Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

10. Not hasty; not violent.

11. Not affecting the scent strongly.

She made it good
At the hedge corner, in the coldest fault. Shakspeare.

12. Not having the scent strongly affected.

Smell this business with a sense as cold
As is a dead man's nose. Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

COLD. † n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. The cause of the sensation of cold; the privation of heat; the frigorific power.

Fair-lined slippers for the cold. Shakspeare.

Heat and cold are nature's two hands, whereby she chiefly worketh: and heat we have in readiness, in respect of the fire; but for cold we must stay 'till it cometh, or seek it in deep caves, or high mountains; and when all is done, we cannot obtain it in any great degree. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the earth with cold and heat
Searce tolerable, and from the north to call
Decrepid winter, from the south to bring

2. The sensation of cold; coldness; chillness.

When she saw her lord prepar'd to part,
A deadly cold ran shivering to her heart. Dryden, Fab.

3. A disease caused by cold; the obstruction of perspiration. This is an Italian expression. "Pigliare una calda, i. e. pigliare una scarmiana." Vocab. Della Crusc. in V. CALDA. The same as our phrase, to catch cold.

What disease hast thou? —

A whorson cold, sir; a cough. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Let no ungentle cold destroy
All taste we have of heavenly joy. Roscommon.

Those rains, so covering the earth, might providentially contribute to the disruption of it, by stopping all the pores, and all evaporation, which would make the vapours within struggle violently, as we get a fever by a cold. Burnet.

- COLD-BLOODED. * adj. [from cold and blood.] Without feeling or concern.

Thou cold-blooded slave,
Hast thou not spoke like thunder on my side?
And dost thou now fall over to my foes?

Shakspeare, R. John.

- COLD-HEARTED. * adj. [from cold and heart.] Indifferent; wanting passion; unconcerned.

Cleop. Not know me yet?

Ant. Cold-hearted toward me?

Cleop. Ah, dear, if I be so,
From my cold heart let heaven engender hail,
And poison it in the source. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Oh, ye cold-hearted, frozen formalists!
On such a theme, 'tis impious to be calm. Young, Night Th. 4.

CO'LDLY. adv. [from cold.]

1. Without heat.

2. Without concern; indifferently; negligently; without warmth of temper or expression.

What England says, say briefly, gentle lord;
We coldly pause for thee. Shakspeare, King John.

Swift seem'd to wonder what he meant,

Nor would believe my lord had sent;

So never offer'd once to stir,

But coldly said, your servant, sir. Swift.

CO'LDNESS. n. s. [from cold.]

1. Want of heat; power of causing the sensation of cold.

He relates the excessive coldness of the water they met with in summer in that icy region, where they were forced to winter. Boyle, Experiments.

Such was the discord, which did first disperse

Form, order, beauty through the universe;

While dryness moisture, coldness heat resists,

All that we have, and that we are subsists. Denham.

2. Unconcern; frigidity of temper; want of zeal; negligence; disregard.

Divisions of religion are not only the farthest spread, because in religion all men presume themselves interested; but they are also, for the most part, hottest prosecuted: for as much as coldness, which, in other contentions, may be thought to proceed from moderation, is not in these so favourably construed. Hooker, Dedication.

If upon reading admired passages in authors, he finds a coldness and indifference in his thoughts, he ought to conclude that he himself wants the faculty of discovering them. Addison.

It betrayed itself in a sort of indifference and carelessness in all her actions, and coldness to her best friends. Arbuthnot.

3. Coyness; want of kindness; want of passion.

Unhappy youth! how wilt thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom. Addison, Cato.

Let ev'ry tongue its various censures chuse,
Absolve with coldness, or with spite accuse. Prior.

4. Chastity; exemption from vehement desire.

The silver stream her virgin coldness keeps,
For ever murmurs, and for ever weeps. Pope, Windsor Forest.

COLE. † n. s. [Celt. caul; Welsh, cawl; Sax. capl; old Fr. caul and caudet; Ital. and Span. caulo; Lat. caulis.] A general name for all sorts of cabbage.

CO'LESEED. n. s. [from cole and seed.] Cabbage seed.

Where land is rank, it is not good to sow wheat after a fallow; but colesed or barley, and then wheat. Mortimer.

CO'LEWORT. n. s. [caplpyrt, Sax.] A species of cabbage.

The decoction of coleworts is also commended to bathe them. Wiseman of an Erysipelas.

She took the coleworts, which her husband got

From his own ground (a small well-water'd spot);

She stript the stalks of all their leaves; the best
She cull'd, and then with handy care she dress'd. Dryden.

How turnips hide their swelling heads below,
And how the closing coleworts upwards grow. Gay.

CO'LICK. † n. s. [colique, n. s. old Fr. colicus, Lat.]

It strictly is a disorder of the colon; but loosely, any disorder of the stomach or bowels that is attended with pain. There are four sorts: 1. A bilious colick, which proceeds from an abundance of acrimony or choler irritating the bowels, so as to occasion continual gripes, and generally with a looseness; and this is best managed with lenitives and emollients. 2. A flatulent colick, which is pain in the bowels from flatulences and wind, which distend them into unequal and unnatural capacities; and this is managed with carminatives and moderate openers. 3. An hysterical colick, which arises from disorders of the womb, and is communicated by consent of parts to the bowels; and is to be treated with the ordinary hystericks. 4. A nervous colick, which is from convulsive spasms and contortions of the guts themselves, from some disorders of the spirits, or nervous fluid, in their component fibres; whereby their capacities are in many places streightened, and sometimes so as to occasion obstinate obstructions: this is best remedied by brisk catharticks, joined with opiates and emollient diluters. There is also a species of this distemper which is commonly called the stone colick, by consent of parts, from the irritation of the stone or gravel in the bladder or kidneys; and this is most commonly to be treated by nephriticks and oily diureticks, and is greatly assisted with the carminative turpentine clysters. Quincy.

Colicks of infants proceed from acidity and the air in the aliment expanding itself, while the aliment ferments. Arbuthnot.

Co'lick. adj. Affecting the bowels.

Intestine stone, and ulcer, colick pangs. Milton, P. L.

To COLLA.* v. a. [old Fr. coller, and accoller; "dare brachia cervici," says Barret, in translating this word, i. e. to embrace round the neck, collum; and thus the word is equal to our old expression, "fell on the neck and kissed him." See St. Luke, xv. 20.] To embrace. See COLLING.

So having said, her twixt her arms twaine
She streightly strain'd, and collod tenderly.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. ii. 34.

To COLLA'PSE. v. n. [collabor, collapsus, Lat.] To fall together; to close so as that one side touches the other.

In consumptions and atrophy the liquids are exhausted, and the sides of the canals collapse; therefore the attrition is increased, and consequently the heat. Arbuthnot on Diet.

COLLA'PSED.* adj. [Lat. collapsus.] Withered; ruined; fallen down.

What else do our papists, but, by keeping the people in ignorance, vent and broach all their new ceremonies and traditions, when they conceal the Scriptura, read it in Latine, and to some few alone, feeding the slavish people in the mean time with tales out of legends, and such like fabulous narrations? Whom do they begin with—but collapsed ladies, some few tradesmen, superstitious old folks, illiterate persons, weak women, &c. Burton, Anal. of Mel. p. 655.

Let the boiling pleasures of the rebellious flesh evaporate a little, and let me drain my boggy soul from those corrupted inbred humours of collapsed nature.

Quarles, Judg. and Mercy, The Procrastinator.

COLLA'PSION.† n. s. [from collapse.]

1. The act of closing or collapsing.

The mark remains in some degree visible in the collapse of the skin after death. Russell on Indian Serpents, p. 7.

2. The state of vessels closed.

COLLAR.† n. s. [Span. collar; old Fr. coeler; Lat. collare.]

1. A ring of metal put round the neck.

That's nothing, says the dog, but the fretting of my collar: nay, says the wolf, if there be a collar in the case, I know better things than to sell my liberty. L'Estrange.

Ten brace and more of greyhounds,
With golden muzzles all their mouths were bound,
And collars of the same their neck surround. Dryden, Fab.

2. The part of the harness that is fastened about the horse's neck.

Her waggon-spokes made of long spinners legs,
The traces of the smallest spider's web,
The collars of the moonshine's watry beams. Shakespeare.

3. The part of the dress that surrounds the neck.
It bindeth me about as the collar of my coat, Job, xxx. 18.

4. To slip the COLLAR. To get free; to escape; to disentangle himself from any engagement or difficulty.

When as the ape him heard so much to talk
Of labour, that did from his liking baulk,
He would have slipped the collar handsomely.

Spenser, Habb. Tale.

5. A COLLAR of Brawn, is the quantity bound up in one parcel.

There is history in words as well as etymology. Thus brawn, being made of the collar or breast part of the boar, is termed a collar of brawn. The brawn or boar begets collar; which being rolled up, conveys the idea to any thing else; and eel, so dressed, takes the name of collared eel; as does also collared beef, &c. So that every thing rolled bears the name and arms of collar. Pegge, Anec. of the Eng. Language.

COLLAR-BONE. n. s. [from collar and bone.] The clavicle; the bones on each side of the neck.

A page riding behind the coach, fell down, bruised his face, and broke his right collarbone. Wiseman's Surg.

To COLLAR.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To seize by the collar; to take by the throat.

2. To COLLAR Beef, or other meat; to roll it up, and bind it hard and close with a string or collar, Dr. Johnson says. But see the fifth sense of collar, where the example better explains this use of the word, and presents also collar'd.

COLLARED.* adj. [from collar.] In heraldry, still used for any animal having a collar about its neck. Such are Chaucer's dogs.

Collared with gold, and torettes filed round.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale.

To COLLA'TE.† v. a. [confero, collatum, Latin.]

1. To compare one thing of the same kind with another.

Knowledge will be ever a wandering and indigested thing, if it be but a commixture of a few notions that are at hand and occur, and not excited from a sufficient number of instances, and those well collated. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

They could not relinquish their Judaism, and embrace Christianity, without considering, weighing, and collating both religions. South.

2. To collate books; to examine if nothing be wanting.

Having some years before collated several Greek copies of the New Testament. Fell's Life of Hammond, § 1.

3. To bestow; to confer.

The significance of the sacrament disposes the spirit of the receiver to admit the grace of the spirit of God, there con-signed, exhibited, and collated. Bp. Taylor, Communicant.

4. With to. To place in an ecclesiastical benefice. See COLLATION.

If a patron shall neglect to present unto a benefice, void above six months, the bishop may collate thereunto. Ayliffe.

He thrust out the invader, and collated Amsdorf to the benefice: Luther performed the consecration. Atterbury.

COLLA'TERAL.† adj. [old Fr. collateral, from con and latus, Lat.]

1. Side to side.

In his bright radiance and collateral light
Must I be comforted, not in his sphere. Shakespeare.

Thus saying, from his radiant seat he rose,
On high collateral glory. Milton, P. L.

2. Running parallel.

3. Diffused on either side.

But man by number is to manifest
His single imperfection; and beget
Like of his like, his image multiplied;
In unity defective, which requires
Collateral love, and dearest amity. Milton, P. L.

4. In genealogy, those that stand in equal relation to some common ancestor.

The estate and inheritance of a person dying intestate, is by right of devolution, according to the civil law, given to such as are allied to him ex latere, commonly stiled collaterals, if there be no ascendants or descendants surviving at the time of his death. Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. Not direct; not immediate.
They shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me,
If by direct or by collateral hand
They find us touch'd, we will our kingdom give
To you in satisfaction. Shakespeare.

6. Concurrent.
A collateral bond, is a bond with sufficient sureties. Hudon.
All the force of the motive lies within itself: it receives no collateral strength from external considerations. Atterbury.

COLLATERALLY. adv. [from collateral.]

1. Side by side.
These pullies may be multiplied according to sundry different situations, not only when they are subordinate, but also when they are placed collaterally. Wilkins.

2. Indirectly.
By asserting the scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have created two enemies: the papists more directly, because they have kept the scripture from us; and the fanatics more collaterally, because they have assumed what amounts to an infallibility in the private spirit. Dryden.

3. In collateral relation.
COLLATERALNESS. n. s. [from collateral.] A state of collateral relation or connexion. Cotgrave.

- COLLATION. n. s. [collation, old Fr. collatio, Lat.]
1. The act of conferring or bestowing; gift.
Neither are we to give thanks alone for the first collation of these benefits, but also for their preservation. Ray on the Creation.

2. Comparison of one copy, or one thing of the same kind, with another.
Let us now see how God revenged himself upon sinners, and by way of collation apply it to ourselves. Spekman, Hist. of Sacrilege, i. § 1.

- In the disquisition of truth, a ready fancy is of great use; provided that collation doth its office. Greene, Cosm.
I return you your Milton, which upon collation, I find to be revised and augmented in several places. Pope.

3. In law.
Collation is the bestowing of a benefice, by the bishop that hath it in his own gift or patronage; and differs from institution in this, that institution into a benefice is performed by the bishop at the presentation of another who is patron, or hath the patron's right for the time. Convel.

- Bishops should be placed by collation of the king under his letters patent, without any precedent election or confirmation ensuing. Hayward.

4. A repast; a treat less than a feast; formerly, "a drinking between dinner and supper." Hudon.

- When I came, I found such a collation of wine and sweetmeats prepared, as little corresponded to the terms of the invitation. Whiston's Memoirs, p. 272.

5. Discourse. [old Fr. colacion, harangue, discours.]
No parson, vicar, curate, or lecturer, shall preach any sermon or collation hereafter, but upon some part of the catechism, &c. Abp. Canterbury's Direct. conc. Preachers, 1622.
Sermons, and other collations, and lectures. Const. and Can. Eccl. i.

- No book was more read in the following ages than Cassian's Collations. Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.

6. Collection; shot or dividend contributed.
It [the Apostle's Creed] is called symbolum from συμβολισμός, that signifies to put together, and to cast in money to make up a sum or reckoning. Hence the word symbolum signifies a shot, a badge, a collation, or the word given to the soldiers in war. 1. A shot or collation, because every particular apostle did cast in and collate his article, to make up this sum; at least the whole doth arise out of their common writings. Bp. Nicholson, Expos. of the Catechism, (1662.) p. 25.

COLLATIVIOUS. adj. [collativus, Lat.] Done by the contribution of many. Dict.

COLLATIVE.* adj. [from collate.] In law, an advowson collative is, where the bishop and the patron are one and the same person. Blackstone.

COLLATOR. n. s. [from collate.]

1. One that compares copies, or manuscripts.
To read the titles they give an editor, or collator of a manuscript, you would take him for the glory of letters. Addison.

2. One who presents to an ecclesiastical benefice.
A mandatory cannot interrupt an ordinary collator. All a month is expired from the day of presentation. Ayliffe.

3. One that bestows any gift.
Well-placed benefits redound to the collator's honour. Filtham's Resolves, ii. 16.

TO COLLAUD. v. a. [collaudo, Lat.] To join in praising.

Beasts, wild and tame,
Whom lodgings yield
House, den, or field;
Collaud his name. Howell, Lett. i. v. 11.

COLLEAGUE. n. s. [old Fr. colleague, from collega, Lat.] A partner in office or employment. Anciently accented on the last syllable; but not always.

Easy it might be seen that I intend Mercy colleague with justice, sending thee. Milton, P. L.

Nay must wit
Be colleague to religion, will be it. Denne, Poems, p. 180.

The regents, upon demise of the crown, would keep the peace without colleagues. Swift.

TO COLLEAGUE. v. a. [from the noun.] To unite with.

Collegued with this dream of his advantage,
He hath not fail'd to pester us with message,
Importing the surrender of those lands. Shakespeare, Ham.

COLLEAGUESHIP.* n. s. [from colleague.] Partnership.

The outward duties of a friendship, or a colleagueship in the same family, or in the same journey. Milton, Tetrachordon.

TO COLLECT. v. a. [old Fr. collecter, from collegio, collectura, Lat.]

1. To gather together: to bring into one place.
'Tis memory alone that enriches the mind, by preserving what our labour and industry daily collect. Watts.

2. To draw many units, or numbers, into one sum.
Let a man collect into one sum as great a number as he pleases, this multitude, how great soever, lessens not one jot the power of adding to it. Locke.

3. To gain by observation.
The reverent care I bear unto my lord,
Made me collect these dangers in the duke. Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

4. To infer as a consequence; to gather from premises.

How great the force of erroneous persuasion is, we may collect from our Saviour's premonition to his disciples. Dec. Priety.

They conclude they can have no idea of infinite space, because they can have no idea of infinite matter; which consequence, I conceive, is very ill collected. Locke.

5. To COLLECT himself. To recover from surprise; to gain command over his thoughts; to assemble his sentiments.

Be collected;
No more amazement. Shakespeare, Tempest.

Affrighted much,
I did in time collect myself, and thought
This was so, and no slumber. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale.

Properly unexpected often maketh men careless and remiss; whereas they who receive a wound, become more vigilant and collected. Hayward.

As when of old some orator renown'd
In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence
Flourish'd, since mute, to some great cause address'd,

Stood in himself collected, while each part,
Motion, each act won audience, ere the tongue
Sometimes in highth began, as no delay
Of preface brooking through his zeal of right. Milton, P. L.

COLLECT. † n. s. [collecta, low Lat.] “Some ritualists think, because the word collect is sometimes used both in the vulgar Latin Bible, and by the ancient fathers, to denote the gathering together of the people into religious assemblies; that therefore the prayers are called collects, as being repeated when the people are collected together. Others think they are so named, upon account of their comprehensive brevity; the minister collecting into short forms the petitions of the people, which had before been divided between him and them by versicles and responses; and for this reason God is desired in some of them to hear the prayers and supplications of the people. Though I think it is very probable, that the collects for the Sundays and Holydays bear that name, upon account that a great many of them are evidently collected out of the epistles and gospels.” Wheatly on the Comm. Prayer, ch. 3. § 19.] A short comprehensive prayer, used at the sacrament; any short prayer.

Then let your devotion be humbly to say over proper collects.
Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

COLLE'CTIBLE. adj. [from collect.] That which may be gathered from the premises by just consequence. Whether thereby be meant Euphrates, is not collectible from the following words. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COLLE'CTION. † n. s. [from collect.]

1. The act of gathering together; as, to propose a collection for charitable purposes.

Concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order for the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. 1 Cor. xvi. 1.

2. An assemblage; the things gathered.

No perjured knight desires to quit thy arms,
Fairest collection of thy sex's charms. Prior.

The gallery is hung with a collection of pictures. Addison.

3. The act of deducing consequences; ratiocination; discourse. This sense is now scarce in use.

If once we descend unto probable collections, we are then in the territory where free and arbitrary determinations, the territory where human laws take place. Hooker, i. § 8.

Thou shalt not peep thro' lattices of eyes,
Nor hear thro' labyrinths of ears, nor learn
By circuit or collections to discern. Donne.

4. A corollary; a conseqtary deduced from premises; deduction; consequence.

It should be a weak collection, if whereas we say, that when Christ had overcome the sharpness of death, he then opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers; a thing in such sort affirmed with circumstances, were taken as insinuating an opposite denial before that circumstance be accomplished. Hooker.

This label
Is so from sense in hardness, that I can Make no collection of it. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

When she, from sundry arts, one skill doth draw;
Gathering from divers fights, one act of war;

From many cases like, one rule of law:

These her collections, not the senses are.

Davies.

A colliquative fever is such as is attended with a diarrhoea, sweats, from too lax a contexture of the fluids. Quincy.

It is a consequent of a burning colliquative fever, whereby the humours, fat, and flesh of the body are melted. Harvey.

COLLIQUEFACTION. n. s. [colliquefacio, Lat.] The act of melting together; reduction to one mass by fluxion in the fire.

After the incorporation of metals by simple colliquefaction, for the better discovering of the nature, and consents and dissents of metals, it would be tried by incorporating of their dissolutions. Bacon, Phys. Remains.

COLLISION. n. s. [from collisio, Lat.]

1. The act of striking two bodies together.

Or, by collision of two bodies, grind

The air attrite to fire.

Milton, P. L.

The flint and the steel you may move apart as long as you please; but it is the hitting and collision of them that must make them strike fire. Bentley.

2. The state of being struck together; a clash.

Then from the clashes between popes and kings,

Debate, like sparks from flint's collision, springs. Denham.

The devil sometimes borrowed fire from the altar to consume the votaries; and, by the mutual collision of well-meant zeal, set even orthodox Christians in a flame. Decay of Piety.

TO COLLOCATE. v. a. [colloco, Lat.] To place; to station.

COLLOCATE.* adj. [Lat. collocatus.] Placed. The example is given by Dr. Johnson under the verb.

If you desire to superinduce any virtue upon a person, take the creature in which that virtue is most eminent: of that creature take the parts wherein that virtue is collocate. Bacon.

COLLOCATIO.† n. s. [collocatio, Lat.]

1. The act of placing; disposition.

Whosoever, say the doctors in Beracoth, shall set his bed north and south, shall beget male children, Psalm xvii. 14, &c. Therefore the Jews hold this right of collocation to this day.

Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 93.

2. The state of being placed.

In the collocation of the spirits in bodies, the collocation is equal or unequal; and the spirits coacervate or diffused.

Bacon.

COLLOCUTION. n. s. [collocutio, Lat.] Conference; conversation.

COLLOCUTOR.* n. s. [from the Lat. collocutus.] A dialogist; one of the speakers in a dialogue.

Licentius, one of the collocutors in that dialogue, doth tell us of one Albicerius, a notable diviner.

M. Casaubon of Credulity, &c. p. 148.

In his Tusculan Questions the collocutor, proving the soul to be of a divine nature, argues from this contrivance of Archimedes. Derham.

TO COLLOQUE.† v. n. [probably from colloquor, Lat.]

To wheedle; to flatter; to please with kind words.

A low word, Dr. Johnson says; but he gives no example, by which we may judge of its usage. It does not appear to have been considered as a low word, but as current and as usual, as flatter or wheedle.

They do apply themselves to the times, to lie, dissimble, collogue, and flatter their lieges. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 327.

They will crack, counterfeit, and collogue, as well as the best. Ibid. p. 301.

Here is the Pharisees' "Lord I thank thee;" here is the colloguing Jews' "Domine, Domine, Lord, Lord!"

Bp. Hall, Sermon. The Hypocrite.

COLLO'GUING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Flattery; deceit.

Sherwood.

Such base flattery, parasitical fawning and colloguing, &c. it would ask an expert Vesalius to anatomize every member Burton, Anat. of Mel. Pref.

CO'LOP.† n. s. [It is derived by Minshew from coal and op, a rasher broiled upon the coals; a carbonade. Such is Dr. Johnson's statement. Other whimsical etymologies have been offered, as in Brand's Popular Antiquities. But the old Fr. colp, to cut off, has hitherto been overlooked.]

1. A small slice of meat.

Sweetbread and collops were with skewers prick'd about the sides.

Dryden, Fables.

A cook perhaps has mighty things profess'd;

Then sent up but two dishes nicely dress'd:

What signifies Scotch collops to a feast? King's Cookery.

2. A piece of any animal.

He covereth his face with his fatness, and maketh collops of fat on his flanks.

Job xv. 27.

Take notice what plight you find me in, if there want but a collop or a steak o' me, look to't.

Beaum. and Fl. Maid in the Mill.

The lion is upon his death-bed: not an enemy that does not apply for a collop of him. It's Strange.

3. In burlesque language, a child.

Come, sir page,

Look on me with your welkin eye, sweet villain,

Most dear'st, my collop. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale.

Thou art a collop of my flesh,

And for thy sake I have shed many a tear.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

COLLO'QUIAL.† adj. [from colloquy.] Whatever relates to common conversation.

The seventh epistle of the first book of Horace, and the sixth satire of the second, are here imitated in a style and manner different from the former imitations, in the burlesque and colloquial style and measure of Swift.

Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope.

CO'LLQUIST.* n. s. [from colloquy.] A speaker in a dialogue. See COLLOCUTOR.

The colloquists in this dialogue being all real persons, though concealed under feigned names. Malone, Life of Dryden.

CO'LLQUY.† n. s. [colloquium, Lat.] The earliest example of this word which Dr. Johnson gives is from Taylor, or Milton; who, however, did not introduce the word into our language. Donne writes it colloquium. Conference; conversation; alternate discourse; talk.

Solomon so elegantly characterizeth the drowsy-headed sluggards, that no character in Theophrastus is more graphically described; which he hath done in the form of a short colloquy or dialogue. Fotherby, Atheism. (1622,) p. 200.

All that was alleged and acted in that treaty and colloquy was approved.

Sir G. Buck's Hist. of K. Rich. III. (1646,) p. 23.

My earthly by his heavenly overpow'rd,

In that celestial colloquy sublime,

As with an object that excels the sense,

Dazzled, and spent, sunk down.

Milton, P. L.

In retirement make frequent colloquies, or short discourses, between God and thy own soul. Bp. Taylor.

CO'LLOW.† n. s. [More properly colly, from coal, Dr. Johnson says. But we had formerly the verb collow, to mark or black with coal. Sherwood.]

Collow is the word by which they denote black grime of burnt coals, or wood.

Woodward on Fossils.

COLLU'CTANCY. n. s. [colluctor, Lat.] A tendency to contest; opposition of nature.

COLLU'CTATION. † n. s. [colluctatio, Lat.] Contest; struggle; contrariety; opposition; spite.

Arriving to a state of command over a man's self, and freedom from such colluctations and collisions as are found in the working seas. More, Conj. Cabalist. (1653,) p. 55.

The thermæ, natural baths, or hot springs, do not owe their heat to any colluctation or effervescence of the minerals in them. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To COLLUDE. † v. n. [colluder, old Fr. colludo, Lat.] To conspire in a fraud; to act in concert; to play into the hand of each other.

One notorious, singular, mischievous Antichrist may arise, towards the final consummation of the world; who in fraudulent, colluding, malicious craftiness,—shall go beyond all other that ever lived in the world. Mountagu, App. to Cæsar, p. 159.

COLLU'DER.* n. s. [from collude.] He, who conspires in a fraud or trick.

Colluders yourselves, as violent to this law of God by your unmerciful binding, as the Pharisees by their unbanded loosening! Milton, Tetrachordon.

COLLU'DING.* n. s. [from collude.] Trick; secret management of deceit.

Your goodly glozings, and time-serving colludings with the state, are but like watermen upon the Thames, looking one way, rowing another way. Mountagu, App. to Cæsar, p. 43.

COLLU'SION. † n. s. [collusio, Lat.]

Collusion is, in our common law, a deceitful agreement or compact between two or more, for the one part to bring an action against the other to some evil purpose; as to defraud a third of his right. Cowel.

But most the foxe, maister of collusion;
For he has vowed thy last confusion.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. May.

By the ignorance of the merchants, or dishonesty of weavers, or the collusion of both, the ware was bad, and the price excessive. Swift.

COLLU'SIVE. † adj. [from collude.] •Fraudulently concerted.

The ministers of justice have no opportunity to be collusive, as being free from the great allurement of dealing falsely; for bribery is not known amongst them.

L. Addison, W. Barb. p. 177.

Be strictly upon your guard against all collusive and sophistical arguings whatsoever.

Trapp's Popery truly stated, P. iii. § 2.

COLLU'SIVELY. † adv. [from collusive.] In a manner fraudulently concerted.

If this had been permitted, the land might have been aliened collusively without the consent of the superiour. Blackstone.

COLLU'SIVENESS.* n. s. [from collusive.] Fraudulent concert.

COLLU'SORY. adj. [from colludo, Lat.] Carrying on a fraud by secret concert.

COL'LLY. n. s. [from coal.] The smut of coal.

Suppose thou saw her dressed in some old hirsute attire, out of fashion, coarse raiment, besmeared with soot, colly, perfumed with opopanax. Burton on Melancholy.

To Co'LLY. † v. a. To grime with coal; to smut with coal.

Brief as the lightning in the collied night,
That, in a speen, unfolds both heav'n and earth;
And, ere a man hath pow'r to say behold,
The jaws of darkness do devour it up.

Shakespeare.

Thou hast not collied thy face enough. B. Jonson, Poetaste.

COLLY'RUM. † n. s. [Latin, Dr. Johnson says; but no further. It is, in fact, the Gr. καλλύριον, from καλλύρα, which, according to Scaliger, signifies bread sopped, first used as a medicine for the eyes: afterwards all medicines for the eyes, whether ointments or washes, received this name. Our old lexicography has collyrie for this word.] An ointment for the eyes.

COLMAR. n. s. [Fr.] A sort of pear.

Co'LOCYNTH.* n. s. [old Fr. colocinthe, Lat. colocynthis.] Coloquintida; bitter apple. See Co'LO-QUINTIDA.

If they were masters of our affairs, they would suffer nothing to grow but their own colocynths and gourds.

Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, 1st ed.

Co'LOGN Earth. n. s. Is a deep brown, very light bastard ochre, which is no pure native fossil; but contains more vegetable than mineral matter, and owes its origin to the remains of wood long buried in the earth. Hill on Fossils.

Co'LOM. n. s. [κῶλον, a member.]

1. A point [:] used to mark a pause greater than that of a comma, and less than that of a period. Its use is not very exactly fixed, nor is it very necessary, being confounded by most with the semicolon. It was used before punctuation was refined, to mark almost any sense less than a period. To apply it properly, we should place it, perhaps, only where the sense is continued without dependence of grammar or construction; as, I love him, I despise him: I have long ceased to trust, but shall never for bear to succour him.

2. The greatest and widest of all the intestines, about eight or nine hands breadth long. It begins where the ilium ends, in the cavity of the os ilium on the right side; from thence ascending by the kidney, on the same side, it passes under the concave side of the liver, to which it is sometimes tied, as likewise to the gall-bladder, which tinges it yellow in that place: then it runs under the bottom of the stomach to the spleen in the left side, to which it is also knit: from thence it turns down to the left kidney; and thence passing, in form of an S, it terminates at the upper part of the os sacrum, in the rectum.

Quincy.

Now, by your cruelty hard bound,

I strain my guts, my colon wound.

Swift.

The contents of the colon are of a sour, fetid, acid smell in rabbits. Floyer on the Humours.

Co'LONEL. † n. s. [Skinner imagines it originally colonialis, the leader of a colony. Minshew deduces it from colonna, a pillar: as, patriæ columen; exercitus columen. Each is plausible, Dr. Johnson says. But he has omitted to notice, that this word is by our old and good authors written also coronel; as by B. Jonson, "He might have been serjeant-major, if not lieutenant-coronel to the regiment." Every Man out of his Humour. And by Beaumont and Fletcher, "There is no end of wealth, coronel?" Cotgrave also writes it coronel. It is therefore probable, that our word is from the Spanish coronel, who is the commander of a regiment; and his company is the coronela; low Lat. coronellus, chiliarchus, tribunus: Du Cange. Probably from the Lat. corona, a ring or company of men. Milton sounds colonel with three distinct syllables.] The chief commander of a regiment; a field officer of the highest rank, next to the general officers. It is now generally sounded with only two distinct syllables, col'nel.

The chiefest help must be the care of the colonel, that hath the government of all his garrison. Spenser on Ireland.

Captain or colonel, or knight in arms,
Whose chance on these defenceless doors may seize,
If deed of honour did thee ever please,
Guard them, and him within protect from harms.

Milton, Sonnet.

CO'LONELSHIP. n. s. [from colonel.] The office or character of colonel.

While he continued a subaltern, he complained against the pride of colonels towards their officers; yet, in a few minutes after he had received his commission for a regiment, he confessed that colonelship was coming fast upon him. Swift.

COLO'NIAL.* adj. [from colony.] Relating to a colony.

Aicide ambassador in London will be at all your meetings of West India merchants and planters, and, in effect, in all our colonial councils. Burke on a Fugitive Peace.

COLO'NICAL.* adj. [from colonus, Lat.] Relating to husbandmen.

Colonial services were those, which were done by the corvée and serfdom (that is, husbandmen) to their lords. Spelman.

CO'LONIST.* n. s. [from colony.] One departed from the mother-country to inhabit some distant place.

The colonists carry out with them a knowledge of agriculture and of other useful arts, superior to what can grow up of its own accord in the course of many centuries among savage and barbarous nations.

A. Smith, Wealth of Nations, iv. 7.

The colonists emigrated from you.

Burke on Conciliation with America.

To CO'LOITIZE. v. a. [from colony.] To plant with inhabitants; to settle with new planters; to plant with colonies.

There was never an hand-drawn, that did double the rest of the habitable world, before this; for so a man may truly term it, if he shall put to account as well that that is, as that which may be hereafter, by the farther occupation and colonizing of those countries: and yet it cannot be affirmed, if one speak ingenuously, that it was the propagation of the Christian faith that was the adamant of that discovery, entry, and plantation; but gold and silver, and temporal profit and glory; so that what was first in God's providence, was but second in man's appetite and intention.

Bacon, Holy War.

Druina hath advantage by aspect of islands, which she colonizeth and fortifieth daily. Hewell, Vocal Forest.

COLONIZA'TION.* n. s. [from colonize.] This word Mr. Malone believes to have been introduced into our language by the right hon. C. Townshend, chancellor of the exchequer. The act of planting with inhabitants, or forming colonies.

Our ministers are of opinion, that the increase of our trade and manufactures, that our growth by colonization, and by consequence, have concurred to accumulate immense wealth in the hands of some individuals. Burke on the Cause of Discontents.

CO'LOINIZING.* n. s. The same as colonization.

If the dominions of Spain in the New World had been of such moderate extent, as bore any proportion to the parent state, the progress of her colonizing might have been attended with the same benefit, as that of other nations. Robertson.

COLONNA'DE. n. s. [from colonna, Ital. a columnn.]

1. A peristyle of a circular figure, or a series of columns, disposed in a circle, and insulated within side. Builder's Dict.

Here circling colonnades the ground inclose,
And here the marble statues breathe in rows.

Addison.

For you my colonnades extend their wings.

Pope.

CO'LONY. n. s. [colonia, Lat.]

1. A body of people drawn from the mother-country to inhabit some distant place.

To these new inhabitants and colonies he gave the same law under which they were born and bred. Spenser on Ireland.

Rooting out these two rebellious sects, he placed English colonies in their rooms. Davies on Ireland.

Osiris, or the Bacchus of the ancients, is reported to have civilized the Indians, planting colonies and building cities.

Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. The country planted; a plantation.

The rising city, which from far you see,

Is Carthage; and a Tyrian colony.

Dryden, Virg.

CO'LOPHON.* n. s. [Lat.] The conclusion of a book, generally containing the place or the year, or both, of its publication.

They are closed with the following epilogue and colophon.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. g. 2.

CO'LOPHONY. n. s. [from Colophon, a city whence it came.] Rosin.

Of Venetian turpentine, slowly evaporating about a fourth or fifth part, the remaining substance suffered to cool, would afford me a coherent body; or a fine colophony.

Boyle.

Turpentine and oils leave a colophony, upon a separation of their thinner oil.

Floyer on the Humours.

COLOQU'NTIDA.* n. s. [colocynthis, Lat. κολόκυνθις.]

The fruit of a plant of the same name, brought from the Levant, about the bigness of a large orange, and often called bitter apple. Both the seed and pulp are intolerably bitter. It is a violent purgative, of considerable use in medicine.

Chambers.

The food that to him is now as luscious as locusts, shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquintida.

Shakespeare, Othello.

If our famished appetites bear of meat, they fear no coloquintida.

Bp. Rainbow, Sermon (1635) p. 2.

God put in a little coloquintida, which spoiled the whole mess.

South, Sermon viii. 216.

CO'LORATE. adj. [coloratus, Lat.] Coloured; died; marked or stained with some colour.

Had the tunics and humours of the eye been colorate, many rays from visible objects would have been stopt.

Ray.

COLORA'TION. n. s. [coloro, Lat.]

1. The art or practice of colouring.

Some bodies have a more deperable nature than others, as is evident in coloration; for a small quantity of saffron will tint more than a great quantity of brasil.

Bacon.

2. The state of being coloured.

Amongst curiosities I shall place coloration, though somewhat better; for beauty in flowers is their preeminence.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COLORI'FICK. adj. [colorificus, Latin.] That which has the power of producing dyes, tints, colours, or hues.

In this composition of white, the several rays do not suffer any change in their colorifick qualities by acting upon one another; but are only mixed, and by a mixture of their colours produce white.

Newton's Opt.

COLO'SS.* } n. s. [old Fr. colosse, Lat. colossus.]

COLO'SSUS. } A statue of enormous magnitude.

That colossus [of Rhodes] was of gilded brass, and eighty cubits high.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 267.

In that isle he also defaced an hundred other colossuses. Ibid.
Not to mention the walls and palace of Babylon, the pyramids of Egypt, or colosse of Rhodes.

Temple.

There huge colosses rose, with trophies crown'd,

And rascal characters were grav'd around.

Pope.

COLO'SSAL.* adj. [old Fr. colossal, which Cotgrave renders colossus-like; and Shakespeare, we may observe, has colossus-wise; but colossal is of recent [date in our language.] Gigantick; like a colossus.

This colossal statue of the celebrated Eastern tyrant is strongly imagined.

Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.

Looking up to this great colossal system of empire thus founded on commerce.

Pownall on the Study of Antiq. p. 55.

COLOSSE'AN. adj. [colossus, Lat.] In form of a colossus; of the height and bigness of such a statue; giantlike.

Among others he mentions the colossean statue of Juno.

Harris, Philol. Inquiries.

COLO'SSIANS. n. s. Christians of Colosse, a considerable city of Phrygia in Asia Minor; to whom St. Paul addressed an epistle. The Rhodians, from the circumstance of their colossus, were also called, by the ancient poets, Colossians.

He [St. Paul] requires his Colossians to forsake those things, [the vicious practices of the Gnosticks;] and to be renewed to that which the Gnosticks have not attained to, ἐμπειρία, to acknowledgement, or discerning, that is, the experimental, practical knowledge of God's goodness to us, (which is more than the first creating,) in regenerating us after his own image, to live according to the divine pattern which he hath set us.

Hammond on the N. Test. Col. iv. 10.

COLO'SSICK. adj. [from coloss.] Though colossick is modern, this adjective is one of our old words, and is employed with good effect in a very forcible passage, written by Chapman, the dramatist, and translator of Homer.] Large, like a colossus.

Men merely great

In their affected gravity of voice,
Sourness of countenance, manners' cruelty,
Authority, wealth, and all the spawn of fortune,
Think they bear all the kingdom's worth before them;
Yet differ not from those colossick statues,
Which, with heroic forms without o'erspread,
Within are nought but mortar, flint, and lead.

Chapman's Trag. of Bussy D'Ambois.

COLO'SSUS-WISE. adv. In the manner of a colossus; astride, as the Colossus at Rhodes stood.

Bastard Margarelon

Hath Dorcus prisoner;
And stands colossus-wise, waving his beam,
Upon the pashed corpses of the kings.

Shakespeare, Tr. and Cress.

COLOUR. n. s. [color, Lat.]

1. The appearance of bodies to the eye only; hue; die.

It is a vulgar idea of the colours of solid bodies, when we perceive them to be a red, or blue, or green tincture of the surface; but a philosophical idea, when we consider the various colours to be different sensations, excited in us by the refracted rays of light, reflected on our eyes in a different manner, according to the different size, or shape, or situation of the particles of which surfaces are composed.

Watts.

Her hair shall be of what colour it please God.

Shakespeare.

For though our eyes can naught but colours see,

Yet colours give them not their pow'r of sight.

Davies.

The lights of colours are more refrangible one than another in this order; red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, deep violet.

Newton's Opt.

2. The freshness; or appearance of blood in the face.

My cheeks no longer did their colour boast.

Dryden.

A sudden horror seiz'd his giddy head,

And his ears trickled, and his colour fled.

Dryden.

3. The tint of the painter.

When each bold figure just begins to live,

The trench'rous colours the fair art betray,

And all the bright creation fades away.

Pope.

4. The representation of any thing superficially examined.

Their wisdom is only of this world, to put false colours upon things, to call good evil, and evil good, against the conviction of their own consciences.

Swift.

5. Concealment; palliation; excuse; superficial cover.

It is no matter if I do halt; I have the wars for my colour, and my pension shall seem the more reasonable.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

Their sin admitted no colour or excuse.

King Charles.

6. Appearance; pretence; false shew.

Under the colour of commending him,

I have access my own love to prefer.

Shakespeare.

Merchants came to Rhodes with a great ship laden with corn, under the colour of the side whereof they rode. All that was done in the city.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

7. Kind; species; character.

Boys and women are, for the most part, cattle of this colour.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

8. In the plural, a standard; an ensign of war; they say the colours of the foot, and standard of the horse.

He at Venice gave

His body to that pleasant country's earth,

And his pure soul unto his captain Christ,

Under whose colours he had fought so long.

Shakespeare, Rich. II.

Against all cheeks, rebukes, and manners,

I must advance the colours of my love,

And not retire.

Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

The banks were filled with companies, passing all along the river under their colours, with trumpets sounding.

Knolles.

9. Colours is used singularly by Addison.

An author compares a ragged coin to a tattered colours.

Addison.

TO COLOUR. v. a. [coloro, Lat.]

1. To mark with some hue, or die.

The rays, to speak properly, are not coloured: in them there is nothing else than a certain power and disposition to stir up a sensation of this or that colour.

Newton's Opt.

2. To palliate; to excuse; to dress in specious colours, or fair appearances.

I told him, that I would not favour or colour in any sort his former folly.

Raleigh, Essays.

He colours the falshood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter to forsake the queen.

Dryden, Dedie. Æn.

3. To make plausible.

We have scarce heard of an insurrection that was not coloured with grievances of the highest kind, or countenanced by one or more branches of the legislature.

Addison, Freeholder.

4. To COLOUR a stranger's goods, is when a freeman allows a foreigner to enter goods at the custom-house in his name; so that the foreigner pays but single duty, when he ought to pay double.

Phillips.

TO COLOUR. v. n. To blush. A low word, only used in conversation.

COLOURABLE. adj. [from colour.] Specious; plausible. It is now little used.

They have now a colourable pretence to withstand innovations, having accepted of other laws and rules already.

Spenser on Ireland.

They were glad to lay hold on so colourable a matter, and to traduce him as an author of suspicious innovation.

Hooker.

Had I sacrificed ecclesiastical government and revenues to their covetousness and ambition, they would have found no colourable necessity of an army.

King Charles.

We hope the mercy of God will consider us unto some ministration of our offences; yet had not the sincerity of our parents so colourable expectations.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COLOURABLENESS. n. s. [from colourable.] That which is made plausible.

You oppose figure to plainness and colourableness.

Fulke against Allen, (1586,) p. 83.

The process, howsoever colourably awarded, hath not hit the very mark whereat it was directed. Bacon.

COLOURED. participial adj. [from colour.] Streaked; diversified with variety of hues.

The coloured are coarser juiced, and therefore not so well, and equally concocted. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COLOURING. † n. s. [from colour.] The part of the painter's art that teaches to lay on his colours with propriety and beauty.

All which amounts to no more than a verbal painting or oral colouring. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands, p. 95.

But as the slightest sketch if justly trac'd,

Is by ill colouring but the more disgrac'd,

So by false learning is good sense defac'd. Pope.

All these amazing incidents do the inspired historians relate nakedly and plainly, without any of the colourings and heightenings of rhetoric. West of the Resurrection, p. 356.

COLOURIST. n. s. [from colour.] A painter who excels in giving the proper colours to his designs.

Titian, Paul Veronese, Van Dyck, and the rest of the good colourists, have come nearest to nature. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

COLOURLESS. adj. [from colour.] Without colour: not distinguished by any hue; transparent.

Transparent substances, as glass, water, and air, when made very thin by being blown into bubbles, or otherways formed into plates, exhibit various colours, according to their various thinness; although, at a greater thickness, they appear very clear and colourless. Newton's Opt.

Pellucid colourless glass or water, by being beaten into a powder or froth, do acquire a very intense whiteness. Bentley.

COLSTAFF.* n. s. A large staff, on which a burthen is carried between two on their shoulders.

COLUMBINE.* n. s. The name of the mistress of Harlequin, in our pantomimes.

COLUMBO Root.* This root derives its name from Columbo, a town in the island of Ceylon, whither it was transplanted from Asia. — It is brought into Europe in circular pieces, about three inches thick, covered with a wrinkled bark of a dark brown hue, and internally it is of a light yellow. It has an aromatick smell, and is bitter, and slightly pungent to the taste. It is reckoned almost a specifick in the cholera morbus, nausea, indigestion, bilious fever, diarrhœa, dysentery, and most disorders of the stomach and bowels. — A tincture is made of it by infusing an ounce in a pint of brandy. — An extract likewise is prepared. Chambers.

COLUMN. † n. s. [columna, Latin.]

1. A round pillar. The word appears to have been not familiar, till late in the reign of Elizabeth; for Sir H. Wotton, in his Elements of Architecture, thus remarks: "Pillars, which we may likewise call columnes; for the word among artificers is almost naturalized." Rem. p. 21.

Some of the old Greek columns, and altars were brought from the ruins of Apollo's temple at Delos. Peacham.

Round broken columns clasping ivy twin'd. Pope.

Scaliger willeth us to admire Plautus as a comedian, but Terence as a pure and elegant speaker.

Peachman of Poetru.

COMEDY. † n. s. [Lat. comœdia, Gr. κωμῳδία, from κῶμη a village, and ᾄδω to sing, as some maintain, because the early attempts at this kind of entertainment were recited or sung from village to village; or, as others conceive, from κωμῳδίζω, to sing things worthy of Comus, the patron of revelry, the first farces having been exhibited at feasts.] A dramatick representation of the lighter faults of mankind; with an intention to make vice and folly ridiculous: opposed to tragedy.

Your honour's players

Are come to play a pleasant comedy.

Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

A long, exact, and serious comedy,

In every scene some moral let it teach, And, if it can, at once both please and teach.

Pope.

COMELILY. * adv. [from comely.] In a graceful or decent manner. [honestement.]

Sherwood.

COMELINESS. n. s. [from comely.] Grace; beauty; dignity. It signifies something less forcible than beauty, less elegant than grace, and less light than prettiness.

A careless comeliness with comely care.

Sid. cy.

The service of God hath not such perfection of grace and comeliness as when the dignity of the place doth concur.

Hooker.

They skilled not of the goodly ornaments of poetry, yet were sprinkled with some pretty flowers, which gave good grace and comeliness.

Spenser on Ireland.

Hardly shall you meet with man or woman so aged or ill-favoured; but, if you will commend them for comeliness, nay and for youth too, shall take it well.

South.

There is a great pulchritude and comeliness of proportion in the leaves, flowers, and fruits of plants.

Ray on the Creation.

A horseman's coat shall hide

Thy taper shape, and comeliness of side.

Prior.

COMELY. adj. [from become; or from epeman, Sax. to please.]

1. Graceful; decent; having dignity or grandeur of mien or look. Comeliness seems to be that species of beauty which excites respect rather than pleasure.

If the principal part of beauty is in decent motion, no marvel though persons in years seem many times more amiable; for no youth can be comely but by pardon, and considering the youth as to make up the comeliness.

Bacon, Ess. 44.

He that is comely when old and decrepit, surely was very beautiful when he was young.

South.

Thou art a comely, young, and valiant knight.

Dryden.

2. Used of things: decent; according to propriety.

Oh! what a world is this, when what is comely.

Envenoms him that hears it.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

This is a happier and more comely time,

Than when these fellows ran about the streets,

Crying confusion.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

COMELY. † adv. [from the adjective. It should be comelily, which is indeed in our old lexicography, though Dr. Johnson has not noticed it. See COMELILY.]

1. Handsomely; gracefully.

To ride comely, to play at all weapons, to dance comely, he very necessary for a courtly gentleman.

Ascham's Schoolmaster.

2. Decently; with propriety.

Those things that either God was honoured with, or his people edified, are decently retained, and in our churches comely practised.

Homily, of the Time and Place of Prayer, P. ii.

COMER. n. s. [from come.] One that comes.

Time is like a fashionable host,

That slightly shakes his parting guest by th' hand;

But with his arms outstretch'd, as he would fly,

Grasps in the comer: welcome ever smiles,

And farewell goes out sighing.

Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

Yourself, renowned prince, then stood as fair

As any comer I have look'd on yet,

For my affection.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Plants move upwards; but if the sap puts up too fast, it maketh a slender stalk, which will not support the weight, and therefore these are all swift and hasty comers.

Bacon.

It is natural to be kind to the last comer.

L'Estrange.

Now leave those joys unsuited to thy age,

To a fresh comer, and resign the stage.

Dryden.

The renowned champion of our lady of Loretto, and the miraculous translation of her chapel, about which he hath published a defiance to the world, and offers to prove it against all comers.

Stillingfleet.

There it is not strange that the mind should give itself up to the common opinion, or render itself to the first comer.

Locke.

House and heart are open for a friend; the passage is easy, and not only admits but even invites the comer.

South.

COMESSATION. * n. s. [Lat. comessatio, from the Gr. κωμῳδία, which is from κῶμος, the heathen deity of revelry. The word seems to have been used by Hales, as a derivative of the Lat. comedo, to eat, and thus to signify a surfeiting; but it is finely employed, in a passage of uncommon eloquence and just indignation at the times, by Bishop Hall, while confined in the Tower, in its original meaning.] Revelling.

For me, I do not envy, but wonder at the licentious freedom, which these men think themselves happy to enjoy; and hold it a weakness in those minds, which cannot find more advantage in confinement and retiredness. Is it a small benefit that I am placed there, where no baths, no blasphemies beat my ears? where my eyes are in no peril of wounding objects? where I hear no invectives, no false doctrines, no sermocinations of ironmongers, feltmakers, cobblers, broom-men, groomers, or any other of those inspired ignorants? no curses, no ribaldries? where I see no drunken gossamers, no rebellious routs, no violent oppressions, no obscene rejoicings, nor aught else that may either vex or affright my soul? This, this is my liberty, who whiles I sit here quietly locked up by my keeper, can pity the tumults and distempers abroad, and bless my own immunity from those too common evils.

Bp. Hall, Free Prisoner, Works, iii. 489.

The world is apt upon all occasions to fall upon unnecessary commensation and computations.

Hales, Sermon, at the close of his Rem. p. 30.

COMESTIBLE.* adj. [Fr. comestible, Lat. comedo, from the Gr. σύν with, and ἔδω to eat.] Eatable.

His markets [were] the best ordered for prices of comestible ware; where, in all his towns, a man might have sent out a child for any flesh or fish, at a rated price every morning.

Wotton, Heem, p. 246.

COMET.* n. s. [Fr. comète, Sax. cometa, Lat. cometa, Gr. κομήτης, from κόμη, a bush of hair.]

A heavenly body in the planetary region appearing suddenly, and again disappearing; and, during the time of its appearance, moving through its proper orbit, like a planet. The orbits of comets are ellipses, having one of their foci in the center of the sun; and being very long and eccentric, they become invisible when in that part most remote from the sun. Comets, popularly called blazing stars, are distinguished from other stars by a long train or tail of light, always opposite to the sun: hence arises a popular division of comets into three kinds, bearded, tailed, and haired comets; though the division rather relates to the different circumstances of the same comet, than to the phenomena of the several. Thus when the comet is eastward of the sun, and moves from it, the comet is said to be bearded, barbatus, because the light marches before it. When the light is westward of the sun, the comet is said to be tailed, because the train follows it. When the comet and the sun are diametrically opposite, the earth being between them, the train is hid behind the body of the comet, excepting a little that appears around it in form of a border of hair, hence called crinitus.

According to Sir Isaac Newton the tail of a comet is a very thin vapour, emitted by the head or nucleus of the comet, ignited by the neighbourhood of the sun, and this vapour is furnished by the atmosphere of the comet. The vapours of comets being thus dilated, rarefied, and diffused, may probably, by means of their own gravity, be attracted down to the planets, and become intermingled with their atmospheres. For the conservation of the water and moisture of the planets, comets seem absolutely requisite; from whose condensed vapours and exhalations, all that moisture which is spent in vegetations and putrefactions, and turned into dry earth, may be resupplied and recruited; for all vegetables increase wholly from fluids; and turn by putrefaction into earth. Hence the quantity of dry earth must continually increase, and the moisture of the globe decrease, and at last be quite evaporated, if it have not a continual supply. And I suspect, adds Sir Isaac, that the spirit which makes the finest, subtilest, and best part of our air, and which is absolutely requisite for the life and being of all things, comes principally from the comets.

The same great author has computed that the sun's heat, in the comet of 1680, was, to his heat with us at Midsummer, as twenty-eight thousand to one; and that the heat of the body of the comet, was near two thousand times as great as that of red-hot iron. He also calculates, that a globe of red-hot iron, of the dimensions of our earth, would scarce be cool in fifty thousand years. If then the comet be supposed to cool a hundred times as fast as red-hot iron, yet, since its heat was two thousand times greater, supposing it of the bigness of the earth, it would not be cool in a million of years.

Triclinus, and Chambers.

And wherefore gaze this goodly company,
As if they saw some wondrous monument,
Some comet, or an unusual prodigy.

Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Such his fell glances, as the fatal light

Of staring comets.

Crashaw.

I considered a comet, or, in the language of the vulgar, a blazing star, as a sky-rocket discharged by an hand that is almighty.

Addison, Guard. No. 103.

Fierce meteors shoot their arbitrary light,

And comets march with lawless horrors bright.

Prior.

COMET-LIKE.* adj. Resembling a comet; exciting wonder and amazement.

I am a maid,

My lord, that ne'er before invited eyes,

But have been gaz'd on, comet-like.

Shakspeare, Peric.

COMET.* n. s. A game at cards.

What say you to a poule at comet at my house?

Southern, Maid's L. Prayer.

CO'METARY.* adj. [from comet.] Relating to a COMETICK.* comet.

Refractions of light are in the planetary and cometary regions, as on our globe.

Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

COMETOGRAPHY.* n. s. [Fr. cometographie, from κομήτης, and γράφω to describe.] A description or treatise of comets.

COMFIT.* n. s. [bellaria arida, Lat. confit, Dutch. It should seem that both are formed by hasty pronunciation from confect.] A dry sweatmeat; any kind of fruit or root, preserved with sugar, and dried.

By feeding me on beans and pease,

He crams in nasty crevices,

And turns to comfits by his arts,

To make me relish for desserts.

Hudibras, iii. i.

To CO'NFIT.* v. a. [from the noun.] To preserve dry with sugar.

The fruit that does so quickly waste,

Men scarce can see it, much less taste,

Thou comfittest in streets to make it last.

Cowley.

CO'NFITURE.* n. s. [from confit, or confection.] Sweetmeat.

From country grass to confitures of court,
Or city's queque-choses, let not report
My mind transport.

Donne, Poems, p. 8.

To CO'NFORT.* v. a. [comforto, low Lat. "Salvia confortat nervos," Schol. Sal. Old Fr. conforter. "Comforter une playe, to corroborate a wound by fomentations, &c." Cotgrave.]

1. To strengthen; to enliven; to invigorate.

The evidence of God's own testimony, added unto the natural assent of reason, concerning the certainty of them, doth not a little comfort and confirm the same. Hooker, b. i.

Light excelleth in comforting the spirits of men : light varied doth the same effect, with more novelty. This is the cause why precious stones comfort. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Some of the abbots had been guilty of comforting and assisting the rebels. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. To console; to strengthen the mind under the pressure of calamity.

They benighted him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him. Job, xlii. 11.

CO'MFORT. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Support; assistance; countenance.

Poyning made a wild chace upon the wild Irish; where, in respect of the mountains and fastnesses, he did little good, which he would needs impute unto the comfort that the rebels should receive underhand from the earl of Kildare. Bacon.

The king did also appoint commissioners for the fining of all such as were of any value, and had any hand or partaking in the aid or comfort of Perkins, or the Cornishmen. Bacon.

2. Consolation; support under calamity or danger.

Her soul heaven's queen, whose name she bears,

In comfort of her mother's tears,

Hath plac'd among her virgin train. B. Jonson.

As they have no apprehension of those things, so they need no comfort against them. Tillotson.

3. That which gives consolation or support in calamity.

I will keep her ignorant of her good,

To make her heavenly comforts of despair,

When it is least expected. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

Your children were vexation to your youth,

But mine shall be a comfort to your age.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

We need not fear

To pass commodiously this life, sustained

By him with many comforts, till we end,

In dust, our final rest and native home. Milton, P. L.

CO'MFORTABLE. adj. [from comfort.]

1. Receiving comfort; susceptible of comfort; cheerful: of persons. Not in use.

For my sake be comfortable; hold death

A while at the arm's end. Shakspeare, As you like it.

My lord leans wond'rously to discontent;

His comfortable temper has forsook him:

He is much out of health. Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

2. Admitting comfort: of condition.

What can promise him a comfortable appearance before his dreadful judge? South.

3. Dispensing comfort; having the power of giving comfort.

He had no brother, which, though it be comfortable for kings to have, yet draweth the subjects eyes aside. Bacon, Hen. VII.

The lives of many miserable men were saved, and a comfortable provision made for their subsistence.

Dryden, Fab. Dedic.

CO'MFORTABLENESS.* n. s. [from comfortable.] A state of comfort; a dispensation of comfort.

We know a playing wit can praise the discretion of an ass, the comfortableness of being in debt, and the jolly commodities of being sick of the plague! Sidney, Def. of Poetry.

Quiet serenity and comfortableness usually attends a virtuous course of life. Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. ii.

The fruitfulness of the vine; the pleasantness of the grape; the comfortableness of the wine.

Wallis, Serm. at Oxf. 1682. p. 5.

CO'MFORTABLY.† adv. [from comfortable.] In a comfortable manner; with cheerfulness; without despair.

Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith the Lord. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned.

Isaiah, xl. 2.

Upon view of the sincerity of that performance, hope comfortably and cheerfully for God's performance. Hammond.

CO'MFORTER.† n. s. [from comfort.]

1. One that administers consolation in misfortunes; one that strengthens and supports the mind in misery or danger.

This very prayer of Christ obtained angels to be sent him, as comforters in his agony. Hooker, v. § 48.

The heav'ns have blest you with a goodly son,

To be a comforter when he is gone. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Nineveh is laid waste; who will bemoen her? whence shall I seek comforters for thee? Neh. iii. 7.

2. The title of the Third Person of the Holy Trinity.

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things.

St. John, xiv. 26.

From heaven

He to his own a Comforter will send,

The promise of the Father, who shall dwell

His Spirit within them,

Milton, P. L. xii. 486.

CO'MFORTFUL.* adj. Full of comfort. Obsolete.

Hulot.

CO'MFORTLESS. adj. [from comfort.] Wanting comfort; being without any thing to allay misfortune: used of persons as well as things.

Yet shall not my death be comfortless, receiving it by your sentence. Sidney, b. ii.

Where was a cave, ywrought with wond'rous art,

Deep, dark, uneasy, doleful, comfortless. Spenser, F. Q.

News fitting to the night;

Black, fearful, comfortless, and horrible.

Shakspeare, King John.

On thy feet thou stood'st at last,

Though comfortless, as when a father mourns

His children, all in view destroyed at once. Milton, P. L.

That unsociable comfortless deafness had not quite tired me.

Swift.

CO'MFORTRESS.* n. s. [from comforter.] She who administers consolation or support.

To be your comfortress, and to preserve you.

B. Jonson, For.

CO'MFREY.† n. s. [consolida, Lat. comfrie, French.]

A plant.

Miller.

Campana here he crops, approved wondrous good:

As comfrey unto him that's bruised, spetting blood.

Get thee some wholesome broth with sage, and comfrey.

Beaumont and Fl. Knight of the Burning Pestle.

CO'MICAL. adj. [comicus, Latin.]

1. Raising mirth; merry; diverting.

The greatest resemblance of our author is in the familiar stile and pleasing way of relating comical adventures of that nature. Dryden, Fab. Preface.

Something so comical in the voice and gestures, that a man can hardly forbear being pleased. Addison on Italy.

2. Relating to comedy; befitting comedy; not tragical.

That all might appear to be knit up in a comical conclusion, the duke's daughter was afterwards joined in marriage to the lord Lisle. Hayward.

They deny it to be tragical, because its catastrophe is a wedding, which hath ever been accounted comical. Gay.

CO'MICALLY.† adv. [from comical.]

1. In such a manner as raises mirth.

This, I confess, is comically spoken.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 570.

The ladies have laugh'd at thee most comically.

B. Jonson, Epicoene.

2. In a manner befitting comedy.

In this tragicomedy of love to act several parts, some satirically, some comically, some in a mixt tone.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 416.

CO'MICALNESS. n. s. [from comical.] The quality of being comical; the power of raising mirth.

COMICK. adj. [comicus, Lat. comique, French.]

1. Relating to comedy; not tragick.

I never yet the tragick muse essay'd,
Deterr'd by thy inimitable maid;
And when I venture at the comick stile,
Thy scornful lady seems to mock my toil. Wallce.
A comick subject loves an humble verse,
Thyestes scorns a low and comick stile;
Yet comedy sometimes may raise his voice. Roscommon.
Thy tragick muse gives smiles, thy comick sleep. Dryden.

2. Raising mirth.

Stately triumphs, mirthful comick shows,
Such as befit the pleasure. Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. III.

CO'MING. n. s. [from To come.]

1. The act of coming; approach.

Where art thou, Adam! wont with joy to meet
My coming, seen far off? Milton, P. L.
Sweet the coming on
Of grateful ev'ning mild. Milton, P. L.

2. State of being come; arrival.

May't please you, noble madam, to withdraw
Into your private chamber; we shall give you
The full cause of our coming. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.
Some people in America counted their years by the coming of certain birds amongst them at their certain seasons, and leaving them at others. Locke.

COMING-IN. n. s.

1. Revenue; income.

Here's a small trifle of wives, eleven widows and nine maids, is a simple coming-in for one man. Shakspeare.

The title of comitial denoted such days only, on which the people might be legally assembled. Middleton on the Rom. Senate.

2. Relating to an order of presbyterian assemblies.
See CLASSICAL.

The brethren are to be requested to ordain a distribution of all churches, according to the rules in that behalf set down in the synodical discipline, touching classical, provincial, comitial, or of commencements, and assemblies for the whole kingdom. The classes are to be required to keep acts of memorable matters, which they shall see delivered to the comitial assembly, that from thence they may be brought to the provincial assembly.

Bp. Bancroft, Dangerous Positions, &c. iii. 3.

To COMMA'ND. v. a. [commander, Fr. mando,
Latin.]

1. To govern; to give orders to; to hold in subjection or obedience: correlative to obey.

Look, this feather,
Obeying with my wind when I do blow,
And yielding to another when it blows,
Commanded always by the greater gust;
Such is the lightness of you common men.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Christ could command legions of angels to his rescue.

Dec. Piety.

Should he, who was thy lord, command thee now,
With a harsh voice, and supercilious brow,
To servile duties. Dryden, Pers. Sat. 5.

The queen commands, and we'll obey,
Over the hills, and far away. Old Song.

2. To order; to direct to, be done: contrary to prohibit.

My conscience bids me ask, wherefore you have Commanded of me these most poisonous compounds.

Shakspeare.

We will sacrifice to the Lord our God, as he shall command
us. Ex. viii. 27.

Whatever hypocrites austere talk
Of purity and place and innocence,
Defaming as impure, what God declares
Pure, and commands to some, leaves free to all,
Our Maker bids increase. Who bids abstain
But our destroyer, foe to God and man? Milton, P. L.

3. To have in power.

If the strong cane support thy walking hand,
Chairmen no longer shall the wall command. Gay's Trivia.

4. To overlook; to have so subject, as that it may be seen or annoyed.

Those he commands move only in command,
Nothing in love. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

To COMMA'ND. v. n. To have the supreme authority;
to possess the chief power; to govern.

Those two commanding powers of the soul, the understanding or the will. South, Sermon.

COMMA'ND. n. s. [from the verb. And old Fr.
command.]

1. The right of commanding; power; having a thing in one's power; supreme authority. It is used in military affairs, as magistracy or government in civil life: with over.

Take pity of your town and of your people,
While yet my soldiers are in my command.

Shakespeare, Hen. V.

With lightning fill her awful hand,
And make the clouds seem all at her command. Waller.
He assumed an absolute command over his readers. Dryden.
Not that God wanted the command of gold and silver.

Tillotson, Posth. Sermon. ii. 9.

2. Cogent authority; despotism.

Command and force may often create, but can never cure, an aversion; and whatever any one is brought to by compulsion, he will leave as soon as he can. Locke on Education.

3. The act of commanding; the mandate uttered; order given.

Of this tree we may not taste nor touch;
God so commanded, and left that command
Sole daughter of his voice.

Milton, P. L.

As there is no prohibition of it, so no command for it.

Bp. Taylor.

The captain gives command, the joyful train
Glide through the gloomy shade, and leave the main.

Dryden.

4. The power of overlooking, or surveying any place.

The steepy stand,
Which overlooks the vale with wide command. Dryden, Æn.

COMMANDANT.* n. s. [Fr.] A chief commanding a place or a body of troops.

The commandant cautioned us, as a friend, against returning to the cavern. Smollett, Tr. of Gil Blas.

One would expect, that a serious inquiry would be made into the murder of commandants in the view of their soldiers.

Burke.

COMMAN'DATORY.* adj. [from command.] Having the full force of command.

How commandatory the apostolical authority was, is best discernible by the Apostle's mandates unto the churches upon several occasions, as to the Thessalonians, Who command the brethren.

Bp. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 73.

COMMAN'DER. n. s. [from command.]

1. He that has the supreme authority; a general; a leader; a chief.

We'll do thee homage, and be rul'd by thee,
Love thee as our commander and our king. Shakespeare.
I have given him for a leader and commander to the people.

Isaiah, lv. 4.

The Romans, when commanders in war, spake to their army, and styled them, My soldiers. Bacon, Apophthegms.

Charles, Henry, and Francis of France, often adventured rather as soldiers than as commanders. Hayward.

Sir Phelim O'Neil appeared as their commander in chief.

Clarendon.

Supreme commander both of sea and land.

Waller.

The heroick action of some great commander, enterprised for the common good, and honour of the Christian cause.

Dryden, Jur. Ded.

Their great commanders, by credit in their armies, fell into the scales as a counterpoise to the people.

Swift.

2. A paving beetle, or a very great wooden mallet, with an handle about three foot long, to use in both hands. Moxon.

3. An instrument of surgery.

The glossocomium, commonly called the commander, is of use in the most strong tough bodies, and where the luxation hath been of long continuance. Wiseman's Surgery.

COMMAN'DERY.† n. s. [old Fr. commanderie.]

1. A body of the knights of Malta, belonging to the same nation.

2. The residence of a body of knights.

My next excursion was to see the ruins of a very magnificent structure — said to have been a monastery. I rather suppose it to have been the grand commanderie of the island, [Cyprus,] for it is built in the palatial style of those days.

Drummond's Travels, p. 271.

COMMA'NDINGLY.* adv. [from To command.] In a commanding or powerful manner.

His practices are so commandingly exemplary, that they do even force and ravish the most maidenly tender conscience.

Hammond's Works, iv. 566.

COMMA'NDMENT. n. s. [commandement, Fr.]

1. Mandate; command; order; precept.

They plainly require some special commandment for that which is exacted at their hands. Hooker, iii. § 7.

Say, you chose him more after our commandment, Than guided by your own affections. Shakespeare, Coriol.

By the easy commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience.

Raleigh, History of the World.

2. Authority; coercive power.

I thought that all things had been savage here,
And therefore put I on the countenance

Of stern commandment. Shakespeare, As you like it.

TO COMME'MORATE. v. a. [con and memoro, Lat.] To preserve the memory by some publick act; to celebrate solemnly.

Such is the divine mercy, which we now commemorate; and if we commemorate it, we shall rejoice in the Lord. Fiddes.

COMMEMORATION. n. s. [from commemorate.] An act of publick celebration; solemnization of the memory of any thing.

That which is daily offered in the church, is a daily commemoration of that one sacrifice offered on the cross.

Bp. Taylor.

St. Austin believed that the martyrs, when the commemorations were made at their own sepulchres, did join their prayers with the churches, in behalf of those who there put up their supplications to God.

Stillington.

Commemoration was formerly made with thanksgiving, in honour of good men departed this world.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

COMMEMORATIVE. adj. [from commemorate.] Tending to preserve memory of any thing.

The annual offering of the paschal lamb was commemorative of that first paschal lamb.

Atterbury.

The original use of sacrifice was commemorative of the original revelation, a sort of daily memorial or record of what God declared, and man believed.

Forbes.

COMMEMORATORY.  adj.* [from commemorate.] Preserving the memory of persons or things.

The succeeding paschal sacrifices, though commemorative of the first, yet varied something from it.

Hosper on Lent, p. 271.

TO COMMENCE. † v. n. [from commencer, Fr.]

1. To begin; to take beginning.

Why hath it given me earnest of success,

Commencing in a truth. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Man, conscious of his immortality, cannot be without concern for that state that is to commence after this life. Rogers.

2. To take a new character.

If wit so much from ignorance undergo,

Ah! let not learning too commence its foe! Pope.

3. To take an academical degree, at Cambridge; in which sense the word is found in our old lexicography, and often used by our elder writers. See also COMMENCEMENT.

Come, doctor Andrew, without disputation,
Thou shalt commence in the cellar.

Beaumont and Fl., Elder Brother.

Many of our English gentlemen do thus commence, as it were, and take degrees in ignorance and vanity.

Ellis's Gentle Shepherd, (1672.) p. 225.

TO COMMENCE. v. a. To begin; to make a beginning of; as, to commence a suit.

Most shallowly did you these arms commence,

Fondly brought here, and foolishly sent hence. Shakspeare.

COMMENCEMENT. † n. s. [from commence.]

1. Beginning; date.

The waters were gathered together into one place, the third day from the commencement of the creation.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The first Tuesday in July at Cambridge, when masters of arts, and doctors in all the faculties, complete their degrees.

Barrow preached a sermon at the commencement, which was practical, and much commended.

Worthington to Hartlib, Ep. 12.

At this commencement, in the year 1677, he was created doctor.

A. Philips, Life of Abp. Williams, p. 48.

TO COMMEND. v. a. [from commend, Lat.]

1. To represent as worthy of notice, regard, or kindness; to recommend.

After Barbarossa was arrived, it was known how effectually the chief bassa had commended him to Solymán.

Knolles's History.

Among the objects of knowledge, two especially commend themselves to our contemplation; the knowledge of God, and the knowledge of ourselves.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Vain-glory is a principle I commend to no man.

Decay of Piety.

2. To deliver up with confidence.

To thee I do commend my watchful soul,
Ere I let fall the windows of mine eyes:
Sleeping and waking, O defend me still.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.

St. Luke, xxiii. 46.

3. To praise; to mention with approbation.

Who is Silvia? What is she,

That all our swains commend her?

Holy, fair, and wise is she.

Shakspeare.

Old men do most exceed in this point of folly, commending the days of their youth they scarce remembered, at least well understood not.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

He lov'd my worthless rhymes; and, like a friend,

Would find out something to commend.

Cowley.

Historians commend Alexander for weeping when he read the actions of Achilles.

Dryden, Virg. Æn. Ded.

Each finding, like a friend,

Something to blame, and something to commend.

Pope.

4. To mention by way of keeping in memory; to recommend to remembrance.

Signior Anthonio

Commends him to you,

— Ere I open his letter,

I pray you tell me how my good friend doth.

Shakspeare, Mer. of Ven.

The chorus was only to give the young ladies an occasion of entertaining the French king with vocal music, and of commending their own voices.

Dryden, Dufresnoy.

6. To send.

These draw the chariot which Latinus send,

And the rich present to the prince commends.

Dryden, Æn.

COMMEND. † n. s. [from the verb.] Commendation.

Not now in use, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the example from Shakspeare's Richard the Second. Shakspeare repeatedly uses it; and it is not yet wholly obsolete in some parts.

Tell her I send to her my kind commends;

Take special care my greetings be deliver'd.

Shakspeare, Rich. II.

With my hearty commends, and much endeared love unto you.

Howell, Lett. i. ii. 18.

COMMENDABLE. adj. [from commend.] Laudable; worthy of praise. Anciently accented on the first syllable.

And power, unto itself most commendable,

Hath not a tomb so evident, as a chair

Tell of what it hath done.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

Order and decent ceremonies in the church, are not only comely, but commendable.

Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

Many heroes, and most worthy persons, being sufficiently commendable from true and unquestionable merit, have received advancement from falshood.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Britannia is not drawn, like other countries, in a soft peaceful posture; but is adorned with emblems, that mark out the military genius of her inhabitants. This is, I think, the only commendable quality that the old poets have touched upon in the description of our country.

Addison on Med.

COMMENDABLY. † adv. [from commendable.] Laudably; in a manner worthy of commendation.

Of preachers the shire holdeth a number, all commendably labouring in their vocation.

Carcus, Surv. of Cornwall.

Neither have there been wanting such as have written, and that very commendably, the lives of particular men.

Hakewell on Providence, p. 252.

He might perhaps act very rightly and commendably in so doing.

Louth, Life of Wykeham, p. 309.

COMMENDAM. [commenda, low Latin.] See COMMENDATOR. Commendam is a benefice, which, being void, is commended to the charge and care of some sufficient clerk to be supplied until it be conveniently provided of a pastor.

Cowel.

It had been once mentioned to him, that his peace should be made, if he would resign his bishoprick, and deanery of Westminster; for he had that in commendam. Clarendon.

COMME'NDATARY.† n. s. [old Fr. commendataire.] One who holds a living in commendam.

COMMENDA'TION. n. s. [from commend.]

1. Recommendation; favourable representation.

This jewel and my gold are your's, provided I have your commendation for my more free entertainment.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

The choice of them should be by the commendation of the great officers of the kingdom. Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

2. Praise; declaration of esteem.

His fame would not get so sweet and noble an air to fly in as in your breath, so could not you find a fitter subject of commendation? Sidney, b. ii.

3. Ground of praise.

Good-nature is the most godlike commendation of a man.

Dryden, Juv. Ded.

4. Message of love.

Mrs. Page has her hearty commendations to you too.

Shakspeare, Merry W. of Windsor.

Hark you, Margaret,

No princely commendations to my king! —

— Such commendations as become a maid,

A virgin, and his servant, say to him. Shakspeare, II. n. VI.

COMME'NDATOR.* n. s. [from the old Fr. commendataire.] He who holds a benefice or ecclesiastical dignity in commendam; usually with a bishoprick.

The other [surrender] was of Bisham [abbey] in Berkshire, made by Barlow, bishop of St. David's, that was commendator of it, and a great promoter of the Reformation.

Burnet, Hist. of the Ref. i. 3.

COMME'NDATORY.† adj. [from commend.]

1. Favourably representative; containing praise.

It doth much add to a man's reputation, and is like perpetual letters commendatory, to have good forms; to attain them, it almost sufficeth not to despise them. Bacon, Essays.

We bestow the flourish of poetry on those commendatory conceits, which popularly set forth the eminency of this creature. Brown, Vulg. Err.

If I can think that neither he nor you despise me, it is a greater honour to me, by far, than if all the house of lords writ commendatory verses upon me. Pope.

2. Delivering up with pious hope. Dr. Johnson notices only the first sense. See To COMMEND.

Between seven and eight a clock the rattle began, the commendatory prayer was said for him, and, as it ended, he [K. William III.] died, in the 52d year of his age.

Burnet, Hist. of his own Time.

3. Holding in commendam.

Call those possessors bishops, or canons, or commendatory abbots, or monks, or what you please.

Burke, on the Fr. Revolution.

COMME'NDATORY.* n. s. [from commend.] A commendation; eulogy; declaration of esteem.

To sooth and flatter such persons, would be just as if Cicero had spoke commendatories of Antony, or made panegyrics upon Catiline. South, Sermon viii. 189.

COMME'NDER.† n. s. [from commend.] Praiser.

The only commender of this lady's virtues, is Time.

Bacon, Collect. concern. Q. Eliz.

We think in conclusion ill both of the commender and the commended.

Such a concurrence of two extremes, by most of the same commenders and disprovers.

Wotton, Life and Death of D. of Buckingham.

Unqualified to understand one single page of Cicero, [he] presumes to set up for his commender and patron.

Bentley, Phil. Lips. p. 241.

COMME'NSAL.* n. s. [old Fr. commensal, Lat. commensalis.] A companion at table; one that eats at the same table. Not now in use.

O where hast thou be so long commensal, that hast so mikel eten of the potages of forgetfulness, and drunken so of ignorance! Chaucer, Test. of Love, b. i.

COMMENSALITY.† n. s. [old Fr. commensalite.]

Fellowship of table; the custom of eating together.

They being enjoined and prohibited certain foods, thereby to avoid community with the Gentiles, upon promiscuous commensality. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COMMENSATION.* n. s. [from the Lat. con and mensa, a table.] Eating at the same table.

When Daniel would not pollute himself with the diet of the Babylonians, he probably declined pagan commensation, or to eat of meats forbidden to the Jews.

Sir T. Brown, Miscell. Tracts, p. 15.

COMMENSURABILITY.† n. s. [from commensurable.]

Capacity of being compared with another, as to the measure; or of being measured by another. Thus an inch and a yard are commensurable, a yard containing a certain number of inches. The diameter and circumference of a circle are incommensurable, not being reducible to any common measure. Proportion.

Some place the essence thereof in the proportion of parts, conceiving it to consist in a comely commensurability of the whole unto the parts, and the parts between themselves.

Brown.

COMME'NSURABLE.† adj. [old Fr. commensurable, from con and mensura, Lat.] Reducible to some common measure; as a yard and a foot are measured by an inch. See COMMEASURABLE.

Nor as if those things which are seen, were in equal latitude commensurable with the worlds which were framed.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 1.

If we say, the diameter of the square is incommensurable with its side, we do not intend by IS that it is incommensurable now, having been formerly commensurable.

Harris's Hermes, i. § 6.

COMME'NSURABLENESS. n. s. [from commensurable.]

Commensurability; proportion.

There is no commensurableness between this object and a created understanding, yet there is a congruity and connaturality.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To COMME'NSURATE.† v. a. [from con and mensura, Lat.] To reduce to some common measure.

That division is not natural, but artificial, and by agreement, as the aptest terms to commensurate the longitude of places.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The rare temper and proportion, which the church of England useth in commensurating the forms of absolution to the degrees of preparation and necessity, is to be observed.

Puller, Moderat. of the Church of Eng. p. 319.

COMME'NSURATE.† adj. [from the verb. Heylin reckons this adjective, among uncouth and unusual words, in 1656. Nor are any of the examples, given by Dr. Johnson, from works so far back as that date. That from Smith, which I add, is somewhat nearer to the time.]

1. Reducible to some common measure.

They permitted no intelligence between them, other than by the mediation of some organ equally commensurate to soul and body. Government of the Tongue.

2. Equal; proportionable to each other.

The second signification of the word is æquum, seculum, an age, a certain long space of time, that is commensurate with the duration of the thing that is spoken of.

Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 191.

Is our knowledge adequately commensurate with the nature of things? Glanville's Scepris.

Those who are persuaded that they shall continue for ever, cannot chuse but aspire after a happiness commensurate to their duration. Tillotson.

Nothing commensurate to the desires of human nature, on which it could fix as its ultimate end, without being carried on with any further desire. Rogers, Sermons.

Matter and gravity are always commensurate. Bentley.

COMMENSURATELY. adv. [from commensurate.] With the capacity of measuring, or being measured by some other thing.

We are constrained to make the day serve to measure the year as well as we can, though not commensurately to each year; but by collecting the fraction of days in several years, till they amount to an even day. Holder on Time.

COMMENSURATION. n. s. [from commensurate.] Proportion; reduction of some things to some common measure.

A body over great, or over small, will not be thrown so far as a body of a middle size; so that, it seemeth, there must be a commensuration or proportion between the body moved and the force, to make it move well. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

All fitness lies in a particular commensuration, or proportion of one thing to another. South.

To COMMENT. v. n. [commentor, Lat.]

1. To annotate; to write notes upon an author; to expound; to explain: with upon before the thing explained.

Such are thy secrets, which my life makes good,
And comments on thee; for in ev'ry thing
Thy words do find me out, and parallels bring,
And in another make me understand. Herbert.

Criticks having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and illustrate him.

Dryden, Jur. Med.

They have contented themselves only to comment upon those texts, and make the best copies they could after those originals.

Temple.

Indeed I hate that any man should be idle, while I must translate and comment.

Pope.

2. To make remarks; to make observations.

Enter his chamber, view his lifeless corps,
And comment then upon his sudden death.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

To COMMENT.* v. a.

1. To explain.

In speaking, she studiously avoids all suspicious expressions, which wanton apprehensions may colourably comment into obscenity.

Fidler's Holy State, p. 33.

This was the text commented by Chrysostom and Theodoret.

Reeves, Collat. of the Psalms, p. 18.

2. To devise; to feign.

Where were ye born? Some say in Crete by name,
Others in Thebes, and others elsewhere;
But, wheresoever they comment the same,
They all consent that ye begotten were
And born here in this world. Spenser, F. Q. vi. vii. 53.

COMMENT. † n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Annotations on an author; notes; explanation; exposition; remarks.

I have laboured to bring in all the most obscure passages of Scripture in their proper places, that so the due citation and alleging of them might be as a comment and clear apprehension of their meaning.

Hartlib, Tr. of Comenius's Ref. of Schools, (1642,) p. 50.

Adam came into the world a philosopher, which appeared by his writing the nature of things upon their names: he could view essences in themselves, and read forms without the comment of their respective properties.

South, Sermons.

All the volumes of philosophy,

With all their comments, never could invent

So politic an instrument.

Prior.

Proper gestures, and vehement exertions of the voice, are a kind of comment to what he utters.

Addison, Spect.

Still with itself compar'd, his text peruse;

And let your comment be the Mantuan muse.

Pope.

2. Remarks; observation.

In such a time as this, it is not meet,

That every nice offence should bear its comment. Shakspeare.

VOL. I.

Forgive the comment that my passion made
Upon thy feature; for my rage was blind.

Shakspeare, K. John.

All that is behind will be by way of comment on that part of the church of England's charity. Hammond's Pseudepistols.

COMMENTARY. † n. s. [commentarius, Latin.]

1. An exposition; book of annotations or remarks.

The same things also were reported in the writings and commentaries of Neemias.

2 Macc. ii. 13.

In religion, scripture is the best rule; and the church's universal practice, the best commentary.

King Charles.

2. Memoir; narrative in familiar manner.

The emperor spoke seldom openly, but out of a commentary, that is to say, that he had before provided and written, to the intent that he would speak no more than he had provided.

Sir T. Elgot, Gon. del. 90. b.

Vere, in a private commentary which he wrote of that service, testified that eight hundred were slain.

Bacon.

They show still the ruins of Caesar's wall, that reached eighteen miles in length, as he has declared it in the first book of his commentaries.

Addison on Italy.

To COMMENTATE.* v. n. [from comment.] To annotate; to write notes upon.

Must I for Shakspeare no compassion feel,

Almost eat up by commentating zeal? Pursuits of Literature.

COMMENTATOR. † n. s. [old Fr. commentateur, "a commentator." Cotgrave. It was therefore in use long before Dryden wrote, from whom Dr. Johnson's earliest example is taken. Featley also in 1645 thus plays upon the word, in reference to the Lat. commentation, a falsehood as well as an exposition. "They shall give us leave to esteem them no prophets, but enthusiasts; no inspired men, but distracted; no seers, but dreamers; no expositors, but impostors; no commentators, but commenters, nay rather commentiters!" Dippers Dipt, p. 227.] Expositor; annotator.

I have made such expositions of my authors, as no commentator will forgive me.

Dryden.

Some of the commentators tell us, that Marsyas was a lawyer who had lost his cause.

Addison on Italy.

Galen's commentator tells us, that bitter substances engender choler, and burn the blood.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

No commentator can more slyly pass

O'er a learn'd unintelligible place.

Pope.

COMMENTER. † n. s. [from comment.] One that writes comments; an explainer; an annotator.

With reverence to great Caesar, worthy Romans,

Observe but this ridiculous commenter. B. Jonson, Poetaster.

As sly as any commenter goes by Hard words or sense.

Donne, Poems, p. 124.

The fourth means are commenters and fathers, who have handled the places controverted, which the parson by no means refuseth.

Herbert, Country Parson, cl. 4.

COMMENTITIOUS. † adj. [commentitius, Lat.] Invented; fictitious; imaginary.

But to mark how corruption and apostasy crept in by degrees, and to gather up wherever we find the remaining sparks of original truth, wherewith to stop the mouths of our adversaries, and to bridle them with their own curb, who willingly pass by that which is orthodoxal in them, and studiously cull out that which is commentitious, and best for their turns; not weighing the Fathers in the balance of Scripture, but Scripture in the balance of the Fathers.

Milton, of Prelatical Episcopacy.

It is easy to draw a parallelism between that ancient and this modern nothing, and make good its resemblance to that commentitious inanity.

Glanville's Scepsis.

COMMERCE. † n. s. [commercium, Latin.] It was anciently accented on the last syllable. See also To COMMERCE.

1. Intercourse; exchange of one thing for another; interchange of any thing; trade; traffick.

Places of public resort being thus provided, our repair thither is especially for mutual conference, and, as it were, commerce to be had between God and us. Hooker, v. § 17.

How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
Peaceful commerce from dividable shores,
But by degrees stand in authentick place?

Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

Instructed ships shall sail to quick commerce,
By which remotest regions are ally'd:
Which make one city of the universe,
Where some may gain, and all may be supply'd. Dryden.

These people had not any commerce with the other known parts of the world. Tillotson.

In any country, that hath commerce with the rest of the world, it is almost impossible now to be without the use of silver coin. Locke.

2. Common or familiar intercourse.

Good-nature which consists in overlooking of faults is to be exercised only in doing ourselves justice in the ordinary commerce and occurrences of life. Addison.

3. A game at cards.

To Co'MMERCE.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To traffick.

Ezekiel in the description of Tyre and of the exceeding trade that it had with the East, as the only mart town, reciteth both the people with whom they commerce, and also what commodities every country yielded. Ralegh.

When they might not converse or commerce with any civil men; whither should they fly but into the woods and mountains, and there live in a wild manner. Sir J. Davies.

Beware you commerce not with bankrupts.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

2. To hold intercourse with.

Since great Talbot's gone
Down to thy silence, I commerce with none.

Udington's Casuist, p. 154.

Come, but keep thy wonted state,

With even step and musing gait,

And looks commencing with the skies,

Thy rapt' soul sitting in thine eyes. Milton, H. Pens.

Co'MME'RCIAL.† adj. [from commerce.] Relating to commerce or traffick. This word is of modern introduction into our language; at least is not perhaps of a century's age.

One circumstance prevented commercial intercourse with nations from ceasing altogether. Robt. son.

We are now members for a rich commercial city; this city, however, is but a part of a rich commercial nation, the interests of which are various, multiform, and intricate.

Burke, Speech at Bristol, 1774.

Co'MME'RCIALLY.* adv. [from commercial.] In a commercial view.

I consider the stopping of the distillery, economically, financially, commercially, medically, and in some degree morally too, as a measure rather well meant than well considered.

Burke, Thoughts on Scarcity.

To Co'MMIGRATE. v. n. [con and migro, Latin.]

To remove in a body, or by consent, from one country to another.

Co'MMIGRA'TION. n. s. [from commigrate.] A removal of a large body of people from one country to another.

Both the inhabitants of that and of our world lost all memory of their commigration hence. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

Co'MMINA'TION.† n. s. [comminatio, Lat. commination, old Fr.]

1. A threat; a denunciation of punishment, or of vengeance.

Is it likely that when Christ not only commanded Peter to put up his sword, drawn with greater zeal in passion than judgement upon deliberation, but added also to that charge a commination in generality, That whosoever drew the sword should perish by the sword, his purpose was to bind the hands of his apostles, but yet to leave the passions of those that should succeed them at full liberty?

Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Gornet, li. 3.

Speaks the rude carter to the wagon slow
With threatening words, or to the beasts that draw?

Surely unto the beasts that eas'ly go:

For there's the principle of motion—

Which, though it mov'd by commination,

So stiffly strives, yet from itself it strives,

Bears itself forth with stout contention;

And ever and anon the whip revives

That inward life, so bravely on the rustick drives.

More, Song of the Soul, i. ii. 39.

Some parts of knowledge God has thought fit to seclude from us, to fence them not only by precept and commination, but with difficulty and impossibilities. Decay of Piety.

2. The recital of God's threatenings on stated days.

In the last review of our Liturgy, a clause was added for the sake of explaining the word commination; and the appointing of the times, on which it should be used, left to the discretion of the bishop or ordinary. So that the whole title, as it stands now, run thus: "A commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgements against sinners, with certain prayers to be used on the first day of Lent, and at other times, as the ordinary shall appoint." The ordinaries indeed seldom or never make use of the power here given them, except that sometimes they appoint part of the office, viz. from the 31st Psalm to the end, to be used upon solemn days of fasting and humiliation. But as to the whole office, it is never used entirely, but upon the day mentioned in the title of it, viz. the first day of Lent.

Wheatly on the Com. Pr. ch. 14. Introd.

Co'MMINATORY.† adj. [old Fr. comminatoire.] Denunciatory; threatening.

Half-hearted creatures, as these are,—

On two or three comminatory terms,

Would run their fears to any hole of shelter.

B. Jonson, Magn. Indul.

To Co'MMINGLE. v. a. [commisceo, Latin.] To mix into one mass; to unite intimately; to mix; to blend.

Blest are those,

Whose blood and judgement are so well commingled,

That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger,

To sound what stop she please. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

To Co'MMINGLE. v. n. To unite one with another.

Dissolutions of eum tragacanth and oil of sweet almonds do not commingle, the oil remaining on the top 'till they be stirred. Bacon, Physical Rem.

To Co'MMINUATE.* v. a. [Lat. comminuo, old Fr. comminuer. See To Co'MMINUTE.] To grind.

The more solid food which needs greater manducation, cannot be sufficiently comminuted for chyle, or ground low enough for the stomach, until these teeth have done this work upon it. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 82.

It will comminate things of so hard a substance that no mill can break. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 104.

Co'MMINU'BLE. adj. [from comminute.] Frangible; reducible to powder; susceptible of pulverisation.

The best diamonds are comminuble, and are so far from breaking hammers, that they submit unto pestilation, and resist not any ordinary pestle. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To Co'MMINUTE. v. a. [comminuo, Latin.] To grind; to pulverise; to break into small parts.

Parchment, skins, and cloth drink in liquors, though themselves be intire bodies, and not comminuted, as sand and ashes.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Co'MMINU'TION. n. s. [from comminute.]

1. The act of grinding into small parts; pulverisation.

The jaw in men and animals furnished with grinders, hath an oblique or transverse motion, necessary for commination of the meat. Ray on the Creation.

This smiting of the steel with the flint doth only make a commination, and a very rapid whirling and melting of some particles; but that idea of flame is wholly in us. Bentley.

2. Attenuation.

Causes of fixation are the even spreading of the spirits and tangible parts, the closeness of the tangible parts, and the jejuneness or extreme commination of spirits; of which the two first may be joined with a nature liquefiable. Bacon.

COMMISERABLE. adj. [from commiserate.] Worthy of compassion; pitiable; such as must excite sympathy or sorrow.

It is the sinfullest thing in the world to destitute a plantation once in forwardness: for, besides the dishonour, it is the guiltiness of blood of many commiserable persons. Bacon, Ess.

This was the end of this noble and commiserable person, Edward eldest son to the duke of Clarence. Bacon, Hen. VII.

To COMMISERATE. v. a. [con and misereor, Lat.]

To pity; to look on with compassion; to compassionate.

Then we must those, who groan beneath the weight Of age, disease, or want, commiserate. Denham.

COMMISERATOR.* n. s. [from commiserate.] He who has mercy or compassion.

Deaf unto the thunder of the laws, and rocks unto the cries of charitable commiserators. Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 6.

COMMISSARIAT.* n. s. [Fr.] A body of persons, attending an army, who are commissioned to regulate the procuration and conveyance of ammunition or provision. See COMMISSARY. The word is derived from modern warfare.

COMMISSARIASHIP. n. s. [from commissary.] The office of a commissary.

A commissariaship is not grantable for life, so as to bind the succeeding bishop, though it should be confirmed by the dean and chapter. Ayliffe's Parergon.

COMMISSARY.† n. s. [commissarius, low Latin; commissaire, old Fr.]

1. An officer made occasionally for a certain purpose; a delegate; a deputy.

Great Destiny the Commissary of God,
That hast mark'd out a path and period
For every thing, who, where we off-spring took,
Our ways and ends, seest at one instant.

Donne, Poems, p. 294.

2. It is a title of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, appertaining to such as exercises spiritual jurisdiction (at least so far as his commission permits) in places of the diocese so far distant from the chief city, as the chancellor cannot call the subjects. Cowel.

The commissaries of bishops have authority only in some certain place of the diocese, and in some certain causes of the jurisdiction limited to them by the bishop's commission.

Ayliffe.

3. An officer who draws up lists of the numbers of an army, and regulates the procuration and conveyance of provision or ammunition.

But is it thus you English bards compose?

With Runick lays thus tag insipid prose?

And when you should your heroes deeds rehearse,

Give us a commissary's list in verse?

Prior.

COMMISSION.† n. s. [commissio, low Lat. old Fr. commission.]

1. The act of entrusting any thing.

2. A trust; a warrant by which any trust is held, or authority exercised.

Commission is the warrant, or letters patent, that all men exercising jurisdiction, either ordinary or extraordinary, have for their power. Cowel.

Omission to do what is necessary,

Seals a commission to a blank of danger.

Shakespeare, Troil. and Cress.

The subjects grief

Comes through commissions, which compel from each

The sixth part of his substance, to be levied

Without delay.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

He led our powers;

Bore the commission of my place and person;

The which immediacy may well stand up,

And call itself your brother.

Shakespeare, King Lear.

He would have them fully acquainted with the nature and extent of their office, and so he joins commission with instruction: by one he conveys power, by the other knowledge.

South.

3. A warrant by which a military officer is constituted.

Solyman, filled with the vain hope of the conquest of Persia, gave out his commissions into all parts of his empire, for the raising of a mighty army. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

I was made a colonel; though I gained my commission by the horse's virtues, having leapt over a six-bar gate.

Addison, Freetholder.

He for his son a gay commission buys,

Who drinks, whores, fights, and in a duel dies.

Pope.

4. Charge; mandate; office; employment.

It was both a strange commission, and a strange obedience to a commission, for men, in the midst of their own blood, and being so furiously assailed, to hold their hands contrary to the laws of nature and necessity. Baron, War with Spain.

Such commission from above

I have receiv'd, to answer thy desire

Of knowledge within bounds.

Milton, P. L.

At his command the storm invades;

The winds by his commission blow;

'Till with a nod he bids them cease.

Dryden.

He bore his great commission in his look;

But sweetly temper'd awe, and soften'd all he spoke.

Dryden.

5. Act of committing a crime; perpetration. Sins of commission are distinguished in theology from sins of omission.

Every commission of sin introduces into the soul a certain degree of hardness.

South, Sermon.

He indulges himself in the habit of known sin, whether commit-sion of something which God hath forbidden, or the omission of something commanded. Rogers, Sermon.

6. A number of people joined in a trust or office.
7. The state of that which is intrusted to a number of joint officers; as, the great seal was put into commission.

Suppose itinerary commissioners to inspect, throughout the kingdom, into the conduct of men in office, with respect to morals and religion as well as abilities. Swift.

Like are their merits, like rewards they share,
That shines a consul, this commissi mer. Pope, Dunciad.

COMMISSURE. † n. s. [old Fr. commissure, from com-missura, Lat.] Joint: a place where one part is joined to another.

All these inducements cannot countervail the sole inconvenience of shaking and disjoining the commissures with so many strokes of the chisel. Wotton, Architecture.

This animal is covered with a strong shell, jointed like armour by four transverse commissures in the middle of the body, connected by tough membranes. Ray on the Creation.

To COMMIT. v. a. [committo, Lat.]

1. To intrust; to give in trust; to put into the hands of another.

It is not for your health thus to commit
Your weak condition to the raw, cold morning. Shakspeare.

2. To put in any place to be kept safe.

They who are desirous to commit to memory, might have ease. Mac. ii. 25.

Is my muse controul'd
By servile awe? Born free, and not be bold!
At least I'll dig a hole within the ground,
And to the trusty earth commit the sound. Dryden, Pers.

3. To send to prison; to imprison.

Here comes the nobleman that committed the prince, for striking him about Bardolph. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

They two were committed, at least restrained of their liberty.

Clarendon.

So though my ankle she has quitted,
My heart continues still committed;
And, like a bail'd and main-priz'd lover,
Although at large, I am bound over. Hudibras.

4. To perpetrate; to do a fault; to be guilty of a crime.

Keep thy word justly; swear not; commit not with man's sworn spouse. Shakspeare, King Lear.

Letters out of Ulster gave him notice of the inhumane murders committed there upon a multitude of the Protestants.

Clarendon.

A creeping young fellow committed matrimony with a brisk gamesome lass. L'Estrange.

'Tis polity

For son and father to take different sides;
Then lands and tenements commit no treason. Dryden.

5. To put together for a contest: a latinism.

How becomingly does Philopolis exercise his office, and seasonably commit the opponent with the respondent, like a long practised moderator. More's Divine Dial.

6. To place in a state of hostility or incongruity: a latinism.

Hurry whose tuneful and well measured song,
First taught our English musick how to span
Words with just note and accent, not to scan
With Midas' ears, committing short and long. Milton.

COMMITMENT. † n. s. [from commit.]

1. An act of sending to prison; imprisonment.

It did not appear by any new examinations or commitments, that any other person was discovered or apprehended.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

They were glad to compound for his bare commitment to the Tower, whence he was within few days enlarged. Clarendon.

I have been considering, ever since my commitment, what it might be proper to deliver upon this occasion. Swift.

2. An order for sending to prison.

3. A parliamentary expression, when a bill is referred to a committee.

The parliament—which thought this petition worthy, not only of receiving, but of voting to a commitment, after it had been advocated, and moved for, by some honourable and learned gentlemen of the house. Milton, Animadv. Rem. Def.

COMMITTEE. † n. s. [from commit.]

1. Those to whom the consideration or ordering of any matter is referred, either by some court to whom it belongs, or by consent of parties. As in parliament, after a bill is read, it is either agreed to and passed, or not agreed to; or neither of these, but referred to the consideration of some appointed by the house, to examine it farther, who thereupon are called a committee. Corvel.

Manchester had orders to march thither, having a committee of the parliament with him, as there was another committee of the Scottish parliament always in that army; there being also now a committee of both kingdoms residing at London, for the carrying on the war. Clarendon.

All corners were filled with covenanters, confusion, committee men, and soldiers, serving each other to their ends of revenge, or power, or profit; and these committee men and soldiers were possess with this covenant. Walton.

2. The person to whom the care of an idiot or lunatick, or of an idiot's or lunatick's estate, is committed. Pronounced with the accent on the last syllable.

The lord chancellor usually commits the care of his person to some friend, who is then called his committee.—The heir is generally made the manager or committee of the estate. Blackstone.

COMMITTEESHIP. * n. s. [from committee.] The office and profit of committees.

Trusted with committeeships and other gainful offices.

Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. i.

COMM'ITER.† n. s. [from commit.] Perpetrator; he that commits.

Such as defile or pollute them, be committers of sacrilege.

Martin on the Marriage of Priests, (1554.) P. 1.

To prove, that the committer of such wickednesses commeth of the will of those men that charge him [the devil] withal.

Crowley's Apolog. of English Writers, (1666.) p. 54. b.

Such an one makes a man not only a partaker of other men's sins, but also a deriver of the whole intire guilt of them to himself; and yet so as to leave the committer of them as full of guilt as he was before.

South, Sermon. ii. 198.

COMM'ITTABLE.† adj. [from commit.] Liable to be committed.

Besides the mistakes committible in the solary compute, the difference of chronology disturbs his computes.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

There is no sin committable by man, as to the kind of it, but by circumstances is capable of being made a sin of presumption.

South, Sermon. vii. 215.

To COMMIX. v. a. [commisceo, Lat.] To mingle; to blend; to mix; to unite with things in one mass.

A dram of gold, dissolved in aqua regia, with a dram of copper in aqua fortis commix'd, gave a great colour.

Bacon.

I have written against the spontaneous generation of frogs in the clouds; or, on the earth, out of dust and rain water commix'd.

Ray on the Creation.

It is manifest by this experiment, that the commixed impressions of all the colours do stir up and beget a sensation of white; that is, that whiteness is compounded of all the colours.

Newton, Opticks.

To COMMIX.* v. n. To unite.

Or, self-conceited, play the humorous Platonist,
Which boldly dares affirm, that spirits themselves supply
With bodies, to commix with frail mortalitie.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 5.

The smile mocking the sigh, that it would fly

From so divine a temple, to commix

With winds that sailors rail at.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

COMMIXION.† n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation of different ingredients.

Were thy commixion Greek and Trojan, so

That thou could'st say, this hand is Grecian all,

And this is Trojan.

Shakspeare, Troilus and Cressida.

We seldom see different dispositions entirely loving; for grows the height of friendship, when two similiary souls do blend in their commixions.

Junius, Son Stigmatiz'd, (1639.) p. 834.

COMMIXTION.† n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation; union of various substances in one mass.

Some species there be of middle and participating natures, that is, of birds and beasts, as bats, and some few others, so conjoined and set together, that we cannot define the beginning or end of either; there being a commixtion of both in the whole, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

By the which word, adultery, although it be properly understood of the unlawful commixtion or joining together of a married man with any woman beside his wife, &c.

Homilies, i. 58.

This commixtion of things, so contrary, doth not tend to the defacing, but adorning, of the world; as concords and discords do, unto the better tempering of the harmony in singing.

Fotherby's Atheon. p. 334.

If both natures were not preserved complete and distinct in Christ, it must either be by the conversion and transubstantiation of one into the other, or by commixtion and confusion of both into one.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii.

COMMIXTURE. n. s. [from commix.]

1. The act of mingling; the state of being mingled; incorporation; union in one mass.

In the commixture of any thing that is more oily or sweet, such bodies are least apt to putrefy, the air working little upon them.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. The mass formed by mingling different things: composition; compouhd.

Fair ladies, mask'd, are roses in the bud;

Or angels veil'd in clouds: are roses blown,

Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shewn.

Shakspeare.

My love and fear glew'd many friends to thee;

And now I fall, thy tough commixtures melt,

Impairing Henry, strength'ning misproud York.

Shakspeare.

There is scarcely any rising but by a commixture of good and evil arts.

Bacon, Ess. 15.

All the circumstances, and respect of religion and state intermixed together in that commixture, will better become a royal history, or a council-table, than a single life.

Wotton, Life, &c. of D. of Buckingham.

COMMO'DE.† n. s. [French. The word appears to have been adopted from the block, on which the dress was shaped. For, in the Fop's Dictionary, or Terms of the Art Cosmetick, printed in 1690, the commode is this: "A frame of wire, covered with silk, on which the whole head-attire is adjusted at once upon a bust, or property of wood, carved to the breasts, like that which peruke-makers set upon their stalls."] The head-dress of women.

Let them reflect how they would be affected, should they meet with a man on horse-back, in his breeches and jack-boots, dressed up in a commode and a night-trail.

Spectator, No. 435.

She has contrived to shew her principles by the setting of her commode; so that it will be impossible for any woman that is disaffected to be in the fashion.

Addison, Freckholder.

She, like some pensive statesman, walks demure,

And smiles, and hugs, to make destruction sure;

Or under high commodes, with looks erect,

Barefac'd devours, in gaudy colours deck'd.

Granville

COMMO'DIOUS. adj. [commodus, Lat.]

1. Convenient; suitable; accommodate to any purpose; fit; proper; free from hindrance or uneasiness.

Such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being o near the moon, it had been too near the sun.

Raleigh's Hist.

To that recess, commodious for surprize,

When purple light shall next suffuse the skies,

With one repair.

Pope, Odys. iv. 550.

2. Useful; suited to wants or necessities.

If they think we ought to prove the ceremonies commodious, they do greatly deceive themselves.

Hooker, iv. 4.

Bacchus had found out the making of wine, and many things else commodious for mankind.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World, i. vi. 5.

The gods have done their part,

By sending this commodious plague.

Dryden and Lee, Oedipus.

Maro's muse,

Thrice sacred muse, commodious precepts gives,

Instructive to the swains.

Philips.

COMMO'DIOUSLY. adv. [from commodious.]

1. Conveniently.

At the large foot of an old hollow tree,

In a deep cave seated commodiously,

His ancient and hereditary house

There dwelt a good substantial country mouse.

Cowley.

2. Without distress.

We need not fear

To pass commodiously this life, sustain'd

By him with in my comforts, 'till we end

In dust; our final rest, and native home.

Milton, P. L.

3. Suitably to a certain purpose.

Wisdom may have framed one and the same thing to serve commodiously for divers ends.

Hooker, v. § 42.

Galen, upon the consideration of the body, challenges any one to find how the least fibre might be more commodiously placed for use or comeliness.

South, Sermon.

COMMO'DIOUSNESS. n. s. [from commodious.] Convenience; advantage.

The place requireth many circumstances; as the situation near the sea, for the commodiousness of an intercourse with England. Baron.

Of cities, the greatness and riches increase according to the commodiousness of their situation in fertile countries, or upon rivers and havens. Temple.

COMMODITY. † n. s. [old Fr. commodité, from commoditas, Lat.]

1. Interest; advantage; profit.

They knew, that howsoever men may seek their own commodity, yet if this were done with injury unto others, it was not to be suffered. Hooker, v. § 10.

Commodity, the bias of the world,
The world, which of itself is poised well,
'Till this advantage, this vile drawing bias,
This sway of motion, this commodity,
Makes it take head from all indifferency,
From all direction, purpose, course, intent.

Shakspeare, K. John.

After much debatement of the commodities or discommodities like to ensue, they concluded. Hagyard.

2. Convenience, particular advantage.

There came into her head certain verses, which, if she had had present commodity, she would have adjoined as a retraction to the other. Sidney, b. ii.

She demanded leave, not to lose this long sought-for commodity of time, to ease her heart. Sidney.

Travellers turn out of the highway, drawn either by the commodity of a foot-path, or the delicacy or the freshness of the field. B. Jonson, Discov.

It had been difficult to make such a mole where they had not so natural a commodity as the earth of Pozzuola, which immediately hardens in the water. Addison on Italy.

3. Wares; merchandise; goods for traffick.

All my fortunes are at sea;

Nor have I money, nor commodity

To raise a present sum. Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice.

Commodities are moveables, valuable by money, the common measure. Locke.

Of money in the commerce and traffick of mankind, the principal use is that of saving the commutation of more bulky commodities. Arbuthnot on Coms.

COMMODORE. † n. s. [probably corrupted from the Spanish comandador. Now pronounced, I think, with the accent on the first syllable.]

1. The captain who commands a squadron of ships; a temporary admiral.

2. A select ship in a fleet of merchantmen, which leads the van in the time of war. Both usages of the word seem to have been adopted in imitation of admiral, which bears two senses; but in both, the employment of commodore is of no great date in our language. It is unnoticed in our dictionaries at the beginning of the last century.

COMMODULATION. * n. s. [Lat. con and modulatio.] Measure; agreement.

If they hold that symmetry, and commodulation, as Vitruvius calls it, which they ought, from the proportion of the head, the hand, &c. may the dimensions of the whole body be infallibly collected. Hakewill on Providence, p. 190.

COMMOIGNE. * n. s. [Fr.] A monk of the same order or convent.

Ioffred Abbot of Crowland, with one Gilbert his commoigne, and III other monks came to his manor of Coteham.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. II.

COMMON. adj. [communis, Latin.]

1. Belonging equally to more than one.

Though life and sense be common, to man and brutes, and their operations in many things alike; yet by this form he lives the life of a man, and not of a brute, and hath the sense of a man, and not of a brute. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

He who hath received damage, has, besides the right of punishment common to him with other men, a particular right to seek reparation. Locke.

2. Having no possessor or owner.

Where no kindred are to be found, we see the possessions of a private man revert to the community, and so become again perfectly common, nor can any one have a property in them, otherwise than in other things common by nature. Locke.

3. Vulgar; mean; not distinguished by any excellence; often seen; easy to be had; of little value; not rare; not scarce.

Or as the man whom princes do advance,
Upon their gracious mercy-seat to sit,
Doth common things, of course and circumstance,
To the reports of common men commit.

Davies.

4. Publick; general; serving the use of all.

He was advised by a parliament-man not to be strict in reading all the common prayer, but make some variation. Walt.

I need not mention the old common shore of Rome, which ran from all parts of the town, with the current and violence of an ordinary river. Addison on Italy.

5. Of no rank; mean; without birth or descent.

Look, as I blow this feather from my face,
And as the air blows it to me again,
Such is the lightness of you common men.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Flying bulks now,

To execute his rage, appear too slow;
They miss, or sweep but common souls away,
For such a loss Opdam his life must pay.

Waller.

6. Frequent; usual; ordinary.

There is an evil which I have seen common among men.

Eccles. vi. 1.

The Papists were the most common place, and the butt against whom all the arrows were directed. Clarendon.

Neither is it strange that there should be mysteries in divinity, as well as in the commonest operations in nature. Swift.

7. Prostitute.

'Tis a strange thing, the impudence of some women! was the word of a dame, who herself was common. D'Estrange.

Hipparchus was going to marry a common woman, but consulted Philander upon the occasion. Spectator, No. 475.

8. [In grammar.] Such verbs as signify both action and passion are called common; as aspicio, I despise, or am despised; and also such nouns as are both masculine and feminine, as parens.

Co'MMON. n. s. [from the adjective.] An open ground equally used by many persons.

Then take we down his load, and turn him off,

Like to the empty ass, to shake his ears,

And graze in commons.

Shakspeare, Julius Caesar.

Is not the separate property of a thing the great cause of its endearment? Does any one respect a common as much as he does his garden? South.

Co'MMON. adv. [from the adjective.] Commonly; ordinarily.

I am more than common tall.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

In Co'MMON. †

1. Equally to be participated by a certain number.

By making an explicate consent of every commoner necessary to any one's appropriating to himself any part of what is given in common, children or servants could not cut the meat which their father or master had provided for them in common, without assigning to every one his peculiar part. Locke.

2. Equally with another; indiscriminately.

In a work of this nature it is impossible to avoid puerilities, it having that in common with dictionaries, and books of antiquities. Arbuthnot on Coins.

3. In law, a distinction of tenancy.

Estates may be held in four different ways; in severalty, in joint tenancy, in coparcenary, and in common. Blackstone.

Tenants in common are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession. Ibid.

To Co'MMON. v. n. [from the noun.] To have a joint right with others in some common ground.

COMMON-COUNCIL-MAN. * n. s. One who communicates in council with others; a name yet retained among a part of the citizens of London.

I, who am no common-council-man,
Knew injuries of that dark nature done.

B. Jonson, Mortimer's Fall.

COMMON-CRYER.* n. s. The officer by whom notice is given of things lost. See CRYER.

I will have her cry'd
By the common-cryer, through all the ward;
But I will find her.

B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

COMMON-HALL.* n. s. The place, in which the inhabitants of a city or town assemble.

All the citizens, who were met together in the common-hall, or place of public assemblies. Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xxxiv. 24.

COMMON LAW contains these customs and usages which have, by long prescription, obtained in this nation the force of laws. It is distinguished from the statute law, which owes its authority to acts of parliament.

COMMON-LAWYER.* n. s. He who is versed in the Common Law.

Canonists, civilians, and common-lawyers do all admit this distinction. Spelman.

COMMON PLEAS. The king's court now held in Westminster-hall; but anciently moveable. Gwin observes, that 'till Henry III. granted the magna charta, there were but two courts, the exchequer, and the king's bench, so called because it followed the king; but upon the grant of that charter, the court of common pleas was erected, and settled at Westminster. All civil causes, both real and personal, are, or were formerly, tried in this court, according to the strict laws of the realm; and Fortescue represents it as the only court for real causes. The chief judge is called the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and he is assisted by three or four associates, created by letters patent from the king. Coxe.

COMMONABLE.* adj. [from common.]

1. What is held in common.

Much good land might be gained from forests and chases, and from other commonable places, so as there be care taken that the poor commoners have no injury. Bacon to Villiers.

2. Allowable to be turned on the common.

Commonable beasts are beasts of the plough, or such as manure the ground. Blackstone.

Common appurtenant is where the owner of land has a right to put in other beasts, besides such as are generally commonable, as hogs, goats, and the like. Ibid.

COMMONAGE.* n. s. [old Fr. commuage.] The right of feeding on a common; the joint right of using any thing in common with others.

They have wronged poor people of their commonage, which of right belonged to them. Fuller's Holy State, p. 286.

COMMONALTY.* n. s. [communauté, French.] South writes it commonality.

1. The common people; the people of the lower rank.

Bid him strive
To gain the love o' the commonalty; the duke Shall govern England. Shakspeare.

There is in every state, as we know, two portions of subjects; the nobles and the commonalty. Bacon, Ess. 16.

The emmet joined in her popular tribes

Of commonalty. Milton, P. L. vii. 489.

All gentlemen are almost obliged to it; and I know no reason we should give that advantage to the commonalty of England, to be foremost in brave actions.

The whole nobility, gentry, and all the sober commonalty of the nation. Dryden, Pref. to Ann. Mirab. South, Sermon. v. 47.

2. The bulk of mankind.

I myself too will use the secret acknowledgement of the commonalty bearing record of the God of gods. Hooker, b. iii.

COMMONALITY.* See COMMONALTY.

COMMONER.* n. s. [from common.]

1. One of the common people; a man of low rank; of mean condition.

Doubt not

The commoners, for whom we stand, but they,
Upon their ancient malice, will forget. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.
His great men durst not pay their court to him, 'till he had satiated his thirst of blood by the death of some of his loyal commoners. Addison, Frecholder.

2. A man not noble.

Here comes the king's constable,

And with him a right worshipful commoner,
My good friend, master Giltthead. B. Jonson, the Dev. is an Ass.

This commoner has worth and parts,
Is prais'd for arms, or lov'd for arts;
His head aches for a coronet;

And who is bless'd, that is not great?

Prior.

3. A member of the house of commons.

There is hardly a greater difference between two things than there is between a representing commoner in his public calling, and the same person in common life. Swift.

4. One who has a joint right in common ground.

Much land might be gained from commonable places, so as there be care taken that the poor commoners have no injury. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

5. A student of the second rank at the university of Oxford; one that eats at the common table.

About forty years since, forty pounds per annum for a commoner, (or pensioner, as the term is at Cambridge,) and eighty pounds per annum for a fellow-commoner, was looked on as a sufficient maintenance.

Life of Dr. Prideaux, Lett. to Id. Townshend in 1715.

6. A prostitute.

Behold this ring,

Whose high respect, and rich validity,
Did lack a parallel: yet, for all that,
He gave it to a commoner of the camp. Shakspeare.

7. A partaker; a sharer in common.

Lewis would not leave them, that they might not leave him; but resolved to be a commoner with them in weal or woe; disdaining to be such a niggard of his life, as not to spend it in a good cause in so good company. Fuller's Holy War, p. 196.

COMMUNITION. n. s. [communio, Latin.] Advice; warning; instruction.

COMMUNITIVE.* adj. [from communion.] Advising; warning.

COMMONLY.* adv. [from common.]

1. Frequently; usually; ordinarily; for the most part.

This band of your's requires

Much castigation, exercise devout;

For here's a strong and sweating devil here.

That commonly rebels. Shakspeare, Othello.

A great disease may change the frame of a body, though, if it lives to recover strength, it commonly returns to its natural constitution. Temple.

2. Jointly; in a sociable manner. [Lat. communiter.]

The blessed angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven in gladsome compaign,
And with great joy into that city wend,
As commonly as friend does with his friend. Spenser, F. Q. i. x. 56.

COMMONNESS. n. s. [from common.]

1. Equal participation among many.

Nor can the commonness of the guilt obviate the censure, there being nothing more frequent than for men to accuse their own faults in other persons. Government of the Tongue.

2. Frequent occurrence; frequency.

Blot out that maxim, res nolunt diu male administrari: the commonness makes me not know who is the author; but sure he must be some modern. Swift.

COMMONPLACE.* n. s. A memorandum; an ordinary or common topic. See also COMMONPLACE-BOOK. Johnson uses this substantive in his unfair criticism on Gray, though in his dictionary he has not noticed it.

This being read both in his [Peter Martyr's] commonplaces, and on the first to the Corinthians. Milton, Tetrachordon.

In both of them I have made use of the commonplaces of Satire. Dryden, Pref. to Hind and Panther.

This is my book of drama common-places, the mother of many other plays. Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal.

The subject of many of the letters is commonplace.

Criticism disdains to chase a schoolboy to his common-places. Bentley, Diss. on Phalaris. Johnson, Life of Gray.

COMMONPLACE-BOOK.† n. s. A book in which things to be remembered are ranged under general heads.

I know some have a common-place against common-place-books, and yet perchance will privately make use of what publicly they declaim against. A common-place-book contains many notions in garrison, whence the owner may draw out an army into the field on competent warning.

Fuller's Holy State, p. 164.

I turned to my commonplace-book, and found his case under the word coquette. Tatler, No. 107.

To COMMONPLACE. v. a. To reduce to general heads.

I do not apprehend any difficulty in collecting and common-placing an universal history from the historians. Felton.

COMMONS.† n. s.

1. The vulgar; the lower people; those who inherit no honours. [Fr. commune.] And so Chaucer employs the word, agreeably to its French acceptation.

Yeomen on foot, and communes many one
With shorte staves. Chaucer, Knight's Tale.

Little office
The hateful commons will perform for us;
Except, like curs, to tear us all in pieces.

Shakespeare, Richard II.

Hath he not pass'd the nobles and the commons? Shakespeare.

These three to kings and chiefs their scenes display,
The rest before the ignoble commons play. Dryden, Fables.

The gods of greater nations dwell around,
And, on the right and left, the palace bound;
The commons where they can: the nobler sort,
With winding doors wide open, front the court. Dryden.

2. The lower house of parliament, by which the people are represented, and of which the members are chosen by the people.

My good lord,
How now for mitigation of this bill
Urg'd by the commons? Doth his majesty
Incline to it, or no? Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

In the house of commons many gentlemen, unsatisfied of his guilt, durst not condemn him. King Charles.

3. Food; fare; diet: so called from colleges, where it is eaten in common.

He painted himself of a dove-colour, and took his commons with the pigeons. L'Estrange.

Mean while she quench'd her fury at the flood,
And with a lenten sallad cool'd her blood:
Their commons, though but coarse, were nothing scant;
Nor did their minds an equal banquet want. Dryden.

The doctor now obeys the summons,
Likes both his company and commons. Swift.

To COMMON'STRATE.* v. a. [Lat. commonstrare.] To teach; to shew what is not known. Cockeram.

COMMONWEAL. } n. s. [from common and weal, or COMMONWEALTH. } wealth.

1. A polity; an established form of civil life.

Two foundations bear up public societies; the one inclination, whereby all men desire sociable life; the other an order agreed upon, touching the manner of their union in living together: the latter is that which we call the law of a commonweal. Hooker.

It was impossible to make a commonweal in Ireland, without settling of all the estates and possessions throughout the kingdom. Davies on Ireland.

A continual parliament would but keep the commonweal in tune, by preserving laws in their vigour. King Charles.

There is no body in the commonwealth of learning who does not profess himself a lover of truth. Locke.

2. The publick; the general body of the people.

Such a prince,

So kind a father of the commonweal. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

Their sons are well tutored by you: you are a good member of the commonwealth. Shakespeare, Love's Labour Lost.

3. A government in which the supreme power is lodged in the people; a republic.

Did he, or do yet any of them, imagine
The gods would sleep to such a Stygian practice,
Against that commonwealth which they have founded.

B. Jonson.

Commonwealths were nothing more, in their original, but free cities; though sometimes, by force of orders and discipline, they have extended themselves into mighty dominions.

Temple.

COMMONWEALTHSMAN.* n. s. [from commonwealth.]

One who sides with a republican form of government.

Thomas Parnell was the son of a commonwealthsman of the same name, who, at the restoration, left Congleton in Cheshire, where the family had been established for several centuries.

Johnson, Life of Parnell.

COMMORANCE.† } n. s. [from commorant.] Dwel-

He could not debate any thing without some commotion, when the argument was not of moment.

Clarendon.

3. Disturbance; restlessness.

Sacrifices were offered when an earthquake happened, that he would allay the commotions of the water, and put an end to the earthquake.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

COMMOT'IONER. † n. s. [from commotion.] One that causes commotions; a disturber of the peace.

A dangerous commotioner, that in so great and populous a city as London is, could draw but those same two fellows!

Bacon, Observ. on a Label in 1592.

The people more regarding commotioners than commissioners, flocked together, as clouds cluster against a storm.

Hayward.*

To COMMOT'VE. v. a. [commoveo, Lat.] To disturb; to agitate; to put into a violent motion; to unsettle. Not used.

Strait the sands,

Common'd around, in gathering eddies play.

Thomson, Summer.

To COMMUNE. † v. n. [communico, Lat.] Our word was formerly written common, and common; even so late as in Shakspeare's time; probably from the old Fr. comoner, to advise, or communer, to converse with.] To converse; to talk together; to impart sentiments mutually.

So long as Guyon with her communed,
Unto the ground she cast her modest eye;

And ever and anon, with rosy red,
The bashful blood her snowy cheeks did dye. Spenser, F. Q.*
I will commune with you of such things,
That want no ears but your's.

Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

They would forbear open hostility, and resort unto him privately, that they might commune together as friends.

Hayward.

Then commune, how that day they best may ply
Their growing work.

Milton, P. L.

Ideas, as ranked under names, are those that, for the most part, men reason of within themselves, and always those which they commune about with others.

Locke.

COMMUNICABILITY. † n. s. [from communicable.] The quality of being communicable; capability to be imparted.

We must not look upon the divine nature as sterile, but rather acknowledge the fecundity and communicability of itself, upon which the creation of the world dependeth.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii.

COMMUNICABLE. † adj. [old Fr. communicable.]

1. That which may become the common possession of more than one: with to.

Sith eternal life is communicable unto all, it behooveth that the word of God be so likewise.

Hooker, v. § 20.

2. That which may be recounted; that of which another may share the knowledge: with to.

Nor let thine own inventions hope
Things not reveal'd, which th' invisible king,
Only omniscient, hath suppress'd in night,
To none communicable in earth or heav'n.

Milton, P. L.

3. That which may be imparted.

The happy place
Rather inflames thy torment, representing
Lost bliss, to thee no more communicable.

Milton, P. R.

Secrets may be carried so far, as to stop the communication necessary among all who have the management of affairs. Swift.

4. Conference; conversation.

Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, ye sought for David in times past to be king over you: now then do it. 2 Sam. iii. 17.

The chief end of language, in communication, being to be understood, words serve not for that end, when any word does not excite in the hearer, the same idea which it stands for in the mind of the speaker. Locke.

5. Participation of the blessed sacrament.

All by communicating of one, become, as to that communication, one. Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix.

COMMUNICATIVE. † adj. [old Fr. communicatif.] Inclined to make advantages common; liberal of benefits or knowledge; not close; not selfish.

We conceive them more than some envious and mercenary gardeners will thank us for; but they deserve not the name of that communicative and noble profession. Evelyn's Calendar.

We have paid for our want of prudence, and determine for the future to be less communicative. Swift and Pope.

COMMUNICATIVENESS. † n. s. [from communicative.]

The quality of being communicative, of bestowing or imparting benefits or knowledge.

That which I am to blame in you, is, that your publick common meetings, which should be, as it the table of the Lord; to eat a church-meal, a common Christian feast, are indeed much otherwise, none of that communicativeness and charity among you, as is required in such. Hammond on Acts, vi. 26.

He is not only the most communicative of all beings, but he will also communicate himself in such measure as entirely to satisfy; otherwise some degrees of communicativeness would be wanting. Norris.

COMMUNICATORY. * adj. [from communicate.]

Sirious, who is our companion, and fellow-labourer, with whom the whole world by mutual commerce of canonical and communicatory letters, agrees together with us in one common society. Barrow, Discourse on the Unity of the Church.

COMMUNION. n. s. [communio, Lat.]

1. Intercourse; fellowship; common possession; participation of something in common; interchange of transactions.

Consider, finally, the angels, as having with us that communion which the apostle to the Hebrews noteth: and in regard whereof angels have not declined to profess themselves our fellow servants. Hooder, i. § 4.

We are not, by ourselves, sufficient to furnish ourselves with competent stores for such a life as our nature doth desire; therefore we are naturally induced to seek communion and fellowship with others. Hooker, i. § 10.

The Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Thou, so pleas'd,

Can't raise thy creature to what height thou wilt Of union, or communion, deify'd. Milton, P. L.

We maintain communion with God himself, and are made in the same degree partakers of the Divine nature. Fidles.

2. The common or publick celebration of the Lord's Supper; the participation of the blessed sacrament.

They resolved, that the standing of the communion table in all churches should be altered. Churenion.

Tertullian reporteth that the picture of Christ was engraven upon the communion cup. Peacham on Drawing.

3. A common or publick act.

Men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord; that is, they served and praised God by communion, and in publick manner. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

4. Union in the common worship of any church.

Bare communion with a good church, can never alone make a good man; if it could, we should have no bad ones. South. Ingenious men have lived and died in the communion of that church. Stillingfleet.

COMMUNITY. † n. s. [old Fr. communité, from communitas, Lat.]

1. The commonwealth; the body politick.

How could communities, Degrees in schools, and brotherhood in cities, But by degree, stand in authentick place? Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

Not in a single person only, but in a community or multitude of men. Hammond, Fundamentals.

This parable may be aptly enough expounded of the laws that secure a civil community. L'Estrange.

It is not designed for her own use, but for the whole community. Addison, Guardian.

2. Common possession; the state contrary to property or appropriation.

Sit up and revel, Call all the great, the fair and spirited dames Of Rome about thee, and begin a fashion Of freedom and community. B. Jonson.

The undistinction of many in the community of name, or misapplication of the act of one unto the other, hath made some doubt thereof. Brown, Vulg. Err.

This text is far from proving Adam sole proprietor, it is a confirmation of the original community of all things. Locke.

3. Frequency; commonness. Not in use.

He was but, as the cuckow is in June, Heard, not regarded; seen, but with such eyes, As, sick and blunted with community, Afford no extraordinary gaze. Shakspeare.

COMMUTABILITY. n. s. [from commutable.] The quality of being capable of exchange.

COMMUTABLE. adj. [from commute.] That may be exchanged for something else; that may be bought off, or ransomed.

COMMUTATION. n. s. [from commute.]

1. Change; alteration.

An innocent nature could hate nothing that was innocent: in a word, so great is the commutation, that the soul then hated only that which now only it loves, i. e. sin. South, Sermons.

2. Exchange; the act of giving one thing for another.

The whole universe is supported by giving and returning, by commerce and commutation. South, Sermon.

According to the present temper of mankind, it is absolutely necessary that there be some method and means of commutation, as that of money. Ray on the Creation.

The use of money in the commerce and traffick of mankind, is that of saving the commutation of more bulky commodities. Arbutnot on Coins.

3. Ransom: the act of exchanging a corporal for a pecuniary punishment.

The law of God had allowed an evasion, that is, by way of commutation or redemption. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COMMUTATIVE. † adj. [old Fr. commutatif.] Relative to exchange; as commutative justice, that honesty which is exercised in traffick, and which is contrary to fraud in bargains.

Justice, although it be but one entire virtue, yet is described in two kinds — one, named justice distributive, which is in distribution of honour, money, benefice, or other thing semblable: the other is called commutative, or by exchange. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 142.

Commutative justice requires that every man should have his own. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. i. 7.

The Essenes, like the Pythagoreans, did not buy or sell among themselves, but each supplied the other's wants by a kind of commutative bartering.

Godwyn's Moses and Aaron, i. 11.

COMMUTATIVELY.* adv. [from commutative.] In the way of exchange.

Deity of Piety.

2. To buy off, or ransom one obligation by another.

Some commute swearing for whoring; as if forbearance of the one were a dispensation for the other.

L'Estrange.

To COMMUTE. v. n. To atone; to bargain for exemption.

Those institutions which God designed for means to further men in holiness, they look upon as a privilege to serve instead of it, and to commute for it.

South, Serm.

COMMUTUAL. adj. [from con and mutual.] Mutual; reciprocal: used only in poetry.

Love our hearts, and Hymen did our hands,

Unite commutual in most sacred hands.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

There, with commutual zeal, we both had strove

In acts of dear benevolence and love;

Brothers in peace, not rivals in command.

Pope, Odyssey.

COMPACT.† n. s. [pactum, Lat.]

1. A contract: an accord; an agreement; a mutual and settled appointment between two or more, to do or to forbear something. It had anciently the accent on the last syllable.

I hope the King made peace with all of us;

And the compact is firm and true in me.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

In the beginnings of speech there was an implicit compact, founded upon common consent, that such words, voices, or gestures should be signs whereby they would express their thoughts.

South.

2. Structure; compacture. Not in use.

He was of a mean or low compact, but without disproportion and unevenness either in lineaments or parts.

Sir G. Buck, Hist. of K. Rich. III. p. 148.

To COMPACT. v. a. [compingo compactum, Lat.]

1. To join together with firmness; to unite closely; to consolidate.

Inform her full of my particular fears;

And thereto add such reasons of your own,

As may compact it more.

Blackmore's Creation.

2. To make out of something.

If he, compact of jars, grow musical,

We shall have shortly discord in the spheres.

Shakespeare.

3. To league with.

Thou pernicious woman,

Compact with her that's gone, think'st thou thy oaths,

Though they would swear down each particular fact,

Were testimonies.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

4. To join together; to bring into a system.

We see the world so compact, that each thing preserveth their things, and also itself,

Hooker, i. § 9.

COMPACT. adj. [compactus, Latin.]

1. Firm; solid; close; dense; of firm texture.

Is not the density greater in free and open spaces, void of air and other grosser bodies, than within the pores of water, glass, crystal, gems, and other compact bodies.

Newton, Opt.

Without attraction the dis-severed particles of the chads could never convene into such great compact masses as the planets.

Bentley.

2. Composed; consisting.

The lunatick, the lover, and the poet,
Are of imagination all compact.

Shakespeare.

A wandering fire,
Compact of unctuous vapour, which the night
Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame.

Milton, P. L.

3. Joined; held together.

In one hand Pan has a pipe of seven reeds, compact with wax together.

Peacham.

COMPACTNESS. n. s. [from compact.] Firmness; closeness; density.

Irradiancy or sparkling found in many gems, is not discoverable in this, for it cometh short of their compactness and durability.

Brown.

The best lime mortar will not have attained its utmost compactness, till fourscore years after it has been employed in building. This is one reason why in demolishing ancient fabrics, it is easier to break the stone than the mortar.

Rapley.

The rest, by reason of the compactness of terrestrial matter, cannot make its way to wells.

Woodward.

COMPACTURE.† n. s. [old Fr. compacture.] Structure; manner in which any thing is joined together; compagination. A good word, but not in use.

And over it a fair portecullis hung.

Which to the gate directly did incline,

With comely compass and compacture strong,

Neither unseemly short, nor yet exceeding long.

Spenser, F. 2.

The first whereof, of nature's substance wrought,

Is trained moveable by art divine.

Stirring the whole compacture of the rest.

Brewer's Lingua, iii. 6.

COMPLICES.† n. s. [Latin. Dr. Johnson has omitted to notice that this word has, in our language, the singular compage.] A system of many parts united.

The compage of all physical truth is not so closely joined, but opposition may find intrusion.

Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 2.

[In] the old Hebrew language, wherein the Scripture speaks, there is no one word to express the compages of the superiour and inferiour bodies, which we call mundus, but these two words, heaven and earth, joined to and put together.

Mede, Paraphr. and Expos. of St. Peter, (1642), p. 11.

The organs in animal bodies are only a regular compages of pipes and vessels, for the fluids to pass through. Ray.

COMPAGINATE.* v. a. [Lat. compago, compaginis. Dr. Johnson gives compagination, but had not met with its parent verb.] To set together that which is broken. Cockeram.

Alcibiades, and some twenty horse,
All of companionship. Shakspeare, Timon.

2. Fellowship; association.

If it be honour in your wars, to seem
The same you are not, which, for your best ends,
You call your policy; how is't less, or worse,
That it shall hold companionship in peace
With honour as in war. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

COMPANY.* n. s. [compagnie, French; either from con and pagus, one of the same town; or con and panis, one that eats of the same mess, Dr. Johnson says. I prefer the derivation from the Lat. compago, abl. case compagine, a junction.]

1. Persons assembled together; a body of men.

Go, carry sir John Falstaff to the Fleet;

Take all his company along with him.

Shakspeare, Henry IV.

Honest company, I thank you all,
That have beheld me give away myself
To this most patient, sweet, and virtuous wife. Shakspeare.

2. Persons assembled for the entertainment of each other; an assembly of pleasure.

A crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, where there is no love. Bacon, Essay 28.

3. Persons considered as assembled for conversation; or as capable of conversation and mutual entertainment.

Monsieur Zulichem came to me among the rest of the good company of the town. Temple.

Knowledge of men and manners, the freedom of habitudes, and conversation with the best company of both sexes, is necessary. Dryden.

4. The state of a companion; the act of accompanying; conversation; fellowship.

It is more pleasant to enjoy the company of him that can speak such words, than by such words to be persuaded to follow solitariness. Sidney.

Nor will I wretched thee

In death forsake, but keep thee company. Dryden, Fables.

Abdallah grew by degrees so enamoured of her conversation, that he did not think he lived when he was not in company with his beloved Balsora. Guardian, No. 167.

7. A number of some particular rank or profession; united by some charter; a body corporate; a subordinate corporation.

This emperor seems to have been the first who incorporated the several trades of Rome into companies, with their particular privileges. Arbuthnot on Coins.

8. A subdivision of a regiment of foot; so many as are under one captain.

Every captain brought with him thrice so many in his company as was expected. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

9. To bear COMPANY. } To accompany; to associate with; to be a companion to.

I do desire thee

To bear me company, and go with me. Shakspeare.

Those Indian wives are loving fools, and may do well to keep company with the Arrias and Portins of old Rome. Dryden.

Admitted to that equal sky,

His faithful dog shall bear him company.

Pope, Essay on Man.

Why should he call her whore? Who keeps her company?

Shakspeare, Othello.

10. To keep COMPANY. To frequent houses of entertainment.

11. Sometimes in an ill sense.

To COMPANY. v. a. [from the noun.] To accompany; to attend; to be companion to; to be associated with.

C O M

I am
The soldier that did company these three.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

Thus, through what path soe'er of life we rove,
Rage companies our hate, and grief our love.

Prior,

To COMPANY. † n. s.

1. To associate one's self with.

I wrote to you not to company with fornicators. 1 Cor. v. 9.

2. To be a gay companion. Obsolete.

For there thou needs must learn to laugh, to lye,
To face, to forge, to scoff, to company. Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

3. To have commerce with another sex. See To ACCOMPANY.

Thus have ye dealt with the daughters of Israel; and they for fear *company*ed with you: but the daughter of Juda would not abide your wickedness. Now therefore tell me, under what tree didst thou take them companying together?

Hist. of Susannah, ver. 57.

Well may I think, as a great learned man, although merrily, writeth, that unless God had given a certain notable quantity of foolishness and forgetfulness to all women, after once they had assayed the pains and travails and danger of childbirth, they would never company with men again.

Sir T. Smith, Orat. for Q. Eliz. Marriage.

That in the time of their ordination, it be not so much as required of them to abstain from the lawful companying with their wives.

Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Cler. p. 206.

COMPARABLE. adj. [from To compare.] Worthy to be compared; of equal regard; worthy to contend for preference.

This present world affordeth not any thing comparable unto the publick duties of religion. Hooker, v. §6.

A man comparable with any of the captains of that age, an excellent soldier both by sea and land.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

There is no blessing of life comparable to the enjoyment of a discreet and virtuous friend. Addison, Spect.

COMPARABLY. adv. [from comparable.] In a manner or degree worthy to be compared.

There could no form for such a royal use be comparably imagined, like that of the foresaid nation. Wotton, Architect.

COMPARES. † n. s. [from compare.] In logick, the two things compared to one another.

The second classis of metaphysical, or perhaps more properly logical particles, are those that owe their origine to the topik of the compares; such as, than, much, more, &c. This water is not hot as that; this apple is greater or more great than that.

Dalgarno, Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor, p. 69.

COMPARATION. n. s.* [from the Lat. comparare.] So the old Fr. comparer, acquérir, acheter. See the fourth sense of To COMPARE.] Provision. Obsolete.

Cockeram.

COMPARATIVE. † adj. [comparativus, Lat.]

1. Estimated by comparison; not positive; not absolute.

Thou wert dignified enough,
Ev'n to the point of envy, if 'twere made
Comparative for your virtues, to be stiled
The under hangman of his realm.

Shakespeare, Cymb.

There resteth the comparative that is, granted that it is either lawful or binding; yet whether other things be not to be preferred before the extirpation of heresies. Bacon.

The blossom is a positive good; although the remove of it, to give place to the fruit, be a comparative good. Bacon.

This bubble, by reason of its comparative levity to the fluid that incloses it, would necessarily ascend to the top. Bentley.

2. Having the power of comparing different things.

Beauty is not known by an eye or nose: it consists in a symmetry, and it is the comparative faculty which notes it.

Glanville, Seep. Scient.

3. In grammar, the degree so called.

When it [the adjective] is expressed with augmentation, or with reference to a less degree of the same, it is called the comparative; as, wiser, greater. Lowth, Int. Eng. Gram.

C O M

COMPARATIVE. n. s.* [from the adjective.] One that is fond of making comparisons, or that makes himself another's equal. Not now in use.

To laugh at gilding boys, and stand the push
Of every beardless vain comparative. Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P.I.

Gerard ever was

His full comparative. Beaumont and Fl. Four Plays in Org.

COMPARATIVELY. adv. [from comparative.] In a state of comparison; according to estimate made by comparison; not positively.

The good or evil which is removed may be esteemed good or evil comparatively, and not positively or simply. Bacon.

In this world whatever is called good is comparatively with other things of its kind, or with the evil mingled in its composition; so he is a good man that is better than men commonly are, or in whom the good qualities are more than the bad. Temple.

The vegetables being comparatively lighter than the ordinary terrestrial matter of the globe, subsided last. Woodward.

But how few, comparatively, are the instances of this wise application! Rogers.

To COMPARE. v. a. [comparo, Lat.]

1. To make one thing the measure of another; to estimate the relative goodness or badness, or other qualities of any one thing, by observing how it differs from something else.

I will hear Brutus speak.

I will hear Cassius, and compare their reasons. Shakespeare.

They measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise. 2 Cor. x. 12.

No man can think it grievous who considers the pleasure and sweetness of love, and the glorious victory of overcoming evil with good; and then compares these with the restless torment, and perpetual tumults, of a malicious and revengeful spirit. Tillotson.

He that has got the ideas of numbers, and hath taken the pains to compare one, two, and three to six, cannot choose but know they are equal. Locke.

Thus much of the wrong judgment men make of present, and future pleasure and pain, when they are compared together,
and so the absent considered as future. Locke.

2. It may be observed, that when the comparison intends only similitude or illustration by likeness, we use to before the thing brought for illustration;
as, he compared anger to a fire.

Solon compared the people unto the sea, and orators and counsellors to the winds; for that the sea would be calm and quiet, if the winds did not trouble it. Bacon, Apophthegms.

3. When two persons or things are compared, to discover their relative proportion of any quality, with is used before the thing used as a measure.

Black Macbeth

Will seem as pure as snow, being compar'd
With my conscienceless harms. Shakespeare, Macb.

To compare

Small things with greatest. Milton, P. R.

He carv'd in ivory such a maid so fair,
As nature could not with his art compare. Dryden.

If he compares this translation with the original, he will find that the three first stanzas are rendered almost word for word.

Addison, Spect.

4. To compare is, in Spenser, used after the Lat. comparo, for to get; to procure; to obtain.

But, both from back and belly, still did spare

To fill his bags, and riches to compare.

Spenser, F. Q. i. iv. 28

To COMPARE. v. n.* To vie.

And, with her beantie, bonnie did compare,
Whether of them in her should have the greater share.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. iii. 39.

COMPARE. n. s. [from the verb.]

Oh, things without compare.

As their small galleys may not hold compare
With our tall ships.

Beyond compare the Son of God was seen
Most glorious.

2. Simile; similitude; illustration by comparison.

True swains in love shall in the world to come,
Approve their truths by Troilus; when their rhymes,
Full of protest, and oath, and big compare,
Want similes.

COMPARER.* n. s. [from compare.] He who makes a comparison or estimate.

It was the comparer's purpose to discover Mr. Whitefield's enthusiasms.

Bp. Larington, Fenth. of Meth. and Pap. compared.

COMPARING.* n. s. [from compare.] The act of forming comparison.

In the comparings, we may not look that all should answer in equality.

COMPARISON. n. s. [from compare, Fr.]

1. The act of comparing.

Natalis Comes, comparing his parts with those of a man, reckons his claws among them, which are much more like those of a lion: so easy it is to drive on the comparison too far, to make it good.

Our author saves me the comparison with tragedy; for he says, that herein he is to imitate the tragick poet.

2. The state of being compared.

If we will rightly estimate what we call good and evil, we shall find it lies much in comparison.

Objects near our view are apt to be thought greater than those of a larger size that are more remote; and so it is with pleasure and pain: the present is apt to carry it, and those at a distance have the disadvantage in the comparison.

3. A comparative estimate; proportion.

If men would live as religion requires, the world would be a most lovely and desirable place, in comparison of what now it is.

One can scarce imagine how so plentiful a soil should become so miserably unpeopled, in comparison of what it once was.

4. A simile in writing or speaking; an illustration by similitude.

As fair and as good a kind of hand in hand comparison, had been something too fair and too good for any lady.

5. [In grammar.] The formation of an adjective through its various degrees of signification; as, strong, stronger, strongest.

To COMPART. v. a. [from compartir, Fr. from com and partier, Lat.] To divide; to mark out a general design into its various parts and subdivisions.

I make haste to the casting and comparting of the whole work.

COMPART.* n. s. [from the verb.] Member.

What a continual hell must this create in the soul, to be perpetually worried with so many black and rabid passions; to have all its inferior parts and affections, like those of the monster Scylla, whom the poets talk of as so many dogs, continually barking and snarling at one another, and yet remain unsepara-ble, as being comparts of the same substance.

Scott, Practic. Disc. xxii.

COMPARTIMENT. n. s. [from compartiment, Fr.] A division of picture or design.

The circumference is divided into twelve compartiments, each containing a complete picture.

COMPARTITION. n. s. [from compart.]

To COMPASS.† v. a. [from compasser, Fr. compassare,
Ital. passibus metiri, Lat.]

1. To encircle; to environ; to surround; to inclose;
it has sometimes around, or about, added.

A darksome way,

That deep descended through the hollow ground,
And was with dread and horror compassed around.

Spenser, F. Q.

I see thee compass'd with thy kingdom's peers,
That speak my salutation in their minds.

Now all the blessings

Of a glad father compass thee about!
The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about.

Observe the crowds that compass him around.

To dare that death, I will approach yet nigher;

Thus, went thou compass'd with circling fire.

2. To walk round any thing.

I come, said he, from compassing the earth,
Their travels seen who spring from human birth.

Sandys, Job, p. 4.

By night he fled, and at midnight return'd
From compassing the earth.

Old Chormicus compass'd thrice the crew,
And dipp'd an olive branch in holy dew,

Which thrice he sprinkled round.

3. To beleaguer; to besiege; to block; sometimes with in.

And it was told the Gazites, saying, Samson is come hither.
And they compass'd him in, and laid wait for him all night in the gate of the city.

Thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side.

4. To grasp; to inclose in the arms; to seize.

5. To obtain; to procure; to attain; to have in the power.

was by as great wisdom compassed.

His master being one of great regard,
in court to compass any suit not hard.

If I can check my erring love, I will;
If not, to compass her I'll use my skill.

How can you hope to compass your designs,
And not dissemble them?

He had a mind to make himself master of Weymouth, if he could compass it without engaging his army before it.

Clarendon.

The church of Rome createth titular patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria; so loth is the pope to lose the remembrance of any title that he had once compassed.

Lawrence is the first part, and absolutely necessary to them both: yet no rule ever was, or ever can be given, how to compass it.

The knowledge of what is good and what is evil, what ought and what ought not to be done, is a thing too large to be compassed, and too hard to be mastered, without brains and study, parts and contemplation.

In every work regard the writer's end,
Since none can compass more than they intend.

6. [In law.] To take measures preparatory to any thing; as, to compass the death of the king.

COMPASS. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Circle; round.

This day I breathed first; time is come round;

And where I did begin, there shall I end;
My life is run its compass.

Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

2. Extent; reach; grasp.

O, Juliet, I already know thy grief;
It strains me past the compass of my wits.

That which is out of the compass of any man's power, is to that man impossible.

How few there are may be justly bewailed, the compass of them extending but from the time of Hippocrates to that of Marcus Antoninus.

Animals in their generation are wiser than the sons of men; but their wisdom is confined to a few particulars, and lies in a very narrow compass.

This author hath tried the force and compass of our language with much success.

3. Space; room; limits, either of time or space.

No less than the compass of twelve books is taken up in these.

The English are good confederates in an enterprise which may be dispatched in a short compass of time.

You have heard what hath been here done for the poor by the five hospitals and the workhouse, within the compass of one year, and towards the end of a long, expensive war.

4. Enclosure; circumference.

Th' imperial palace, compass huge, and high
The structure.

Old Rome from such a race deriv'd her birth,
Which now on sev'n high hills triumphant reigns,
And in that compass all the world contains.

5. A departure from the right line; an indirect advance; as, to fetch a compass round the camp.

6. Moderate space; moderation; due limits.

Certain it is, that in two hundred years before (I speak within compass) no such commission had been executed in either of the provinces.

Nothing is likelier to keep a man within compass than the having constantly before his eyes the state of his affairs, in a regular course of account.

7. The power of the voice to express the notes of music.

You would sound me from my lowest note to the top of my compass.

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
This universal frame began:

From harmony to harmony,
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man.

8. [This is rarely used in the singular.] The instrument with which circles are drawn.

If they be two, they are two so,
As stiff twin compasses are two;
Thy soul, the first foot, make no show
To move; but doth, if th' other do.

He took the golden compasses, prepar'd
In God's eternal store, to circumscribe
This universe, and all created things.

To fix one foot of their compass wherever they think fit, and extend the other to such terrible lengths, without describing any circumference at all, is to leave us and ourselves in a very uncertain state.

9. The instrument composed of a needle and card, whereby mariners steer.

The breath of religion fills the sails, profit is the compass by which factious men steer their course.

Rude as their ships was navigation then;
No useful compass or meridian known:
Coasting, they kept the land within their ken,
And knew no North but when the pole-star shone.

With equal force the tempest blows by turns,
From ev'ry corner of the seamen's compass.

He that first discovered the use of the compass, did more for the supplying and increase of useful commodities than those who built workhouses.

10. In old language there was a phrase to come in compass, to be brought round.

COMPASS-SAW. n. s.

The compass-saw should not have its teeth set, as other saws have; but the edge of it should be made so broad, and the back so thin, that it may easily follow the broad edge: its office is to cut a round, and therefore the edge must be made broad, and the back thin, that the back may have a wide kerf to turn it.

COMPA'SSION. n. s. compassion, Fr. from con and pation, Lat. Our word is not often used in the plural, which Dr. Johnson might have noticed; but our version of the bible presents two instances.] Pity; commiseration; sorrow for the sufferings of others; painful sympathy.

Ye had compassions of me in my bonds.

It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.

Show mercy and compassions every man to his brother.

Their angry hand

My brothers hold, and verily since the exact;
This pleads compassion, and repents the fact.

The good-natured man is apt to be moved with compassion for those misfortunes or infirmities, which another would turn into ridicule.

To COMPA'SSION. v. a. [from the noun.] To pity; to compassionate; to commiserate. A word scarcely used, Dr. Johnson says; citing only Tit. Andronicus.

O, heavens! can you hear a good man groan,
And not relent, or not compassion him?

She wept bitterly, and tenderly compassioned so great outrage done, &c.

Wisdom and worth are sacred names; rever'd,
Where not embrac'd: applauded, deify'd;

Why not compassion'd too?

COMPA'SSIONABLE. adj. [from compassion.] Deserving of compassion.

The judge should tender the party's case as compassionable, and desire that he may be delivered from the evil threatening him.

COMPOSEDLY. adv. [from composed.] Calmly; seriously; sedately.

A man was walking before the door very composedly without a hat: one crying, Here is the fellow that killed the duke, every body asked which is he, the man without the hat very composedly answered, I am he. Clarendon.

COMPOSEDNESS. n. s. [from composed.] Sedateness; calmness; tranquillity.

To him that doth good, glory and honour and peace, serenity and composedness of mind, peace that passeth all understanding, joy that is unspeakable and full of glory.

Wilkins on Nat. Rel. ii. ch. 7.

That composedness of mind, that temper of spirit, that displays itself in a quiet endurance of scoffs, slanders, and all the lashes of contumacious tongues. South, Sermon viii. 183.

Having supped with gravity, and an orderly composedness, [they] depart. Potter Antiq. of Greece, ii. 20.

He that will think to any purpose, must have fixedness and composedness of humour, as well as smartness of parts. Norris.

COMPOSER. n. s. [from compose.]

1. An author; a writer.

Now will be the right season of forming them to be able writers and composers in every excellent matter. Milton.

If the thoughts of such authors have nothing in them, they at least do no harm, and shew an honest industry and a good intention in the compose. Addison, Freeholder.

2. He that adapts the musick to words; he that forms a tune.

For the truth of the theory I am in no wise concerned, the composer of it must look to that. Woodward.

For composition I prefer next Ludovico, a most judicious and sweet composer. Peacham on Musick.

The composer has so expressed my sense, where I intended to move the passions, that he seems to have been the poet as well as the composer. Dryden, Alb. and Alban. Pref.

3. A compositor; he that adjusts the types for the printing. This word, unknown to Dr. Johnson, is better than the modern term compositor.

The beginning of such a work will be very difficult, as also the procuring of a sufficient composer, and corrector, for the Eastern languages. Alp. Laud, to the Vice Ch. of Or. 1637.

4. One who composes or adjusts a thing.

To be the composers, contrivers, or assistants, in concluding of any ecclesiastical law.

Bp. of Ossory, (Williams,) Rights of Kings, (1662,) p. 43.

COMPOSITE. adj. [compositus, Lat.]

The composite order in architecture is the last of the five orders of columns; so named because its capital is composed out of those of the other orders; and it is also called the Roman and Italian order. Harris.

Some are of opinion, that the composite pillars of this arch were in imitation of the pillars of Solomon's temple.

Addison on Italy.

COMPOSITION. n. s. [compositio, Latin; compositio, Fr.]

1. The act of forming an integral of various dissimilar parts.

Ipocras, which, besides the nature and strength of the wine itself, hath by the composition and confectio of men, mingling many spices with the same, great power in it, and pleasantness also by the smell.

Expos. of Solomon's Song, (1585,) p. 234.

We have exact forms of composition, whereby they incorporate almost as they were natural simples. Bacon, New Atlantis.

In the time of the Incas reign of Peru, no composition was allowed by the laws to be used in point of medicine, but only simples proper to each disease. Temple.

2. The act of bringing simple ideas into complication, opposed to analysis, or the separation of complex notions.

The investigation of difficult things, by the method of analysis, ought ever to precede the method of composition.

Newton, Opticks.

3. A mass formed by mingling different ingredients.

Heat and vivacity in age, is an excellent composition for business. Bacon, Ess. 43.

Vast pillars of stone, cased over with a composition, that looks the most like marble of any thing our eyes can imagine. Addison.

Jove mix'd up all, and his best clay employ'd,
Then call'd the happy composition Floyd. Swift.

4. The state of being compounded; union; conjunction; combination.

Neither shall ye make any other [oil] like it, after the composition of it: it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you. Whosoever compoundeth any like it,—shall even be cut off from his people. Exod. xxx. 32.

Contemplate things first in their own simple natures, and afterwards view them in composition with other things. Watts.

5. The arrangement of various figures in a picture.

The disposition in a picture is an assembling of many parts, is also called the composition, by which is meant the distribution and orderly placing of things, both in general and in particular. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

6. Written work. Mr. Malone considers Sir H.

Wotton's usage of composition, in a letter dated in 1636, as the first instance of its denoting a written work. But Barret's Alvearie of 1580 presents, under the word COMPACTE, "composition, placing or compacting of wordes together, verborum structura;" so that there can be no question of the age also of this meaning of composition.

Writers are divided concerning the authority of the greater part of those compositions that pass in his name. T. Estrange.

That divine prayer has always been looked upon as a composition fit to have proceeded from the wisest of men. Addison.

When I read rules of criticism, I enquire after the works of the author, and by that means discover what he likes in a composition. Addison, Guardian.

7. Adjustment; regulation.

A preacher in the invention of matter, election of words, composition of gesture, look, pronunciation, motion, useth all these faculties at once. B. Jonson, Discov.

8. Compact; agreement; terms on which differences are settled.

To take away all such mutual grievances, injuries, and wrongs, there was no way but only by going upon composition and agreement amongst themselves. And again, all publick regiment, of what kind soever, seemeth evidently to have arisen from deliberate advice, consultation, and composition between men, judging it convenient and behoveful. Hooker.

Thus we are agreed;

I crave our composition may be written,
And seal'd between us. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Their courage droops, and, hopeless now, they wish
For composition with th' unconquer'd fish. Waller.

9. The act of discharging a debt by paying part; the sum paid.

Persons who have been once cleared by composition with their creditors, or bankruptcy, and afterwards become bankrupts again, unless they pay full fifteen shillings in the pound, are only thereby indemnified as to the confinement of their bodies. Blackstone.

10. Consistency; congruity.

There is no composition in these news,
That gives them credit.

— Indeed they are disproportion'd. Shakspeare, Othello.

11. [In grammar.] The joining of two words together, or the prefixing a particle to another word, to augment, diminish, or change its signification.

12. A certain method of demonstration, in mathematicks, which is the reverse of the analytical method, or of resolution. It proceeds upon principles in themselves self-evident, on definitions, postulates and axioms, and a previously demonstrated series of propositions, step by step, 'till it gives a clear knowledge of the thing to be demonstrated. This is called the synthetical method, and is used by Euclid in his Elements. Harris.

13. [In printing.] The arranging of several letters or types in the composing-stick.

14. [In law.] Satisfaction for tithes. See MODUS.

COMPO'SITIVE. adj. [from compose.] Compounded; or having the power of compounding. Dict.

COMPO'SITOR. † n. s. [from compose.]

1. He that ranges and adjusts the types in printing; distinguished from the pressman, who makes the impression upon paper. See COMPOSER, and CORRECTOR. But our old language has compositor in a general sense, which Dr. Johnson seems not to have known.

The compositor was Mr. Manning, a decent sensible man, who had composed about one half of his [Johnson's] Dictionary, when in Mr. Strahan's printing-house.

Boswell's Life of Johnson.

2. He that composeth or setteth a thing in order.

Bullockar, ed. 1656.

COMPOSSE'SSOR.  n. s.* [old Fr. composse'ssor.] A joint possessor. Sherwood.

COMPO'SSIBLE.  adj.* [con and possible.] Consistent; that which may exist with another thing.

They should make the faith wherewith they believe, an intelligent, compossible, consistent thing, and not define it by repugnancies. Chillingworth, Rel. of Prot. vi. § 7.

COMPOST. † n. s. [Fr. compositum, Lat.]

1. A mixture of various substances for enriching the ground; manure.

Avoid what is to come,
And do not spread the compost on the weeds,
To make them ranker. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

We also have great variety of composts and soils, for the making of the earth fruitful. Bacon, New Atlantis.

Water young planted shrubs, animum especially, which you can hardly refresh too often, and it requires abundant compost.

Evelyn's Kalendar.

There, as his dream foretold, a cart he found,
That carry'd compost forth to dung the ground. Dryden.

In vain the nurling grove
Seems fair awhile, cherish'd with foster earth;
But when the alien compost is exhaust,
Its native poverty again prevails. Philips.

2. Any mixture or composition.

Finding the most pleasurable sin such a sad γλυκύτης, a compost of more bitter than sweet at the very instant, we should never be such blind obedient votaries of Satan.

Hammond, Works, iv. 534.

To COMPO'ST. † v. a. [from the noun.] To manure; to enrich with soil.

By removing into worse earth, or forbearing to compost the earth, water-mint turneth into field-mint and the colewort into rape. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

As for earth, it composteth itself; for I knew a garden that had a field poured upon it, and it did bear fruit excellently.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

How many fields have been drenched with blood, and composted with carcases! Bp. Hall, Sermon, 1641.

COMPO'STURE. † n. s. [old Fr. composture.] Soil; manure. Not used.

The earth's a thief,
That feeds and breeds by a composture stolen
From general excrement. Shakspeare, Timon.

COMPO'SURE. † n. s. [from compose.]

1. The act of composing or inditing.

Their own forms are not like to be so sound, or comprehensive of the nature of the duty, as of forms of publick composure.

King Charles.

2. Arrangement; combination; mixture; order.

Hence languages arise, when, by institution and agreement, such a composure of letters, such a word, is intended to signify such a certain thing. Holder, El. of Speech.

From the various composures and combinations of these corpuscles together, happen all the varieties of the bodies formed out of them. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

3. The form arising from the disposition of the various parts.

In composure of his face,
Liv'd a fair, but manly grace. Crashaw.

4. Frame; make; temperament.

To reel the streets at noon, and stand the bullet
With slaves that smell of sweat; say this becomes him:
As his composure must be rare indeed,

Whom these things cannot blemish. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cl.

The duke of Buckingham sprung, without any help, by a kind of congenial composure, to the likeness of our late sovereign and master. Wotton.

5. Adjustment.

God will rather look to the inward raptures of the mind than to the outward form and composure of the body. Duypa.

6. Composition; framed discourse. See COMPOSITION. This is of older usage, by at least the difference of a century, than Atterbury's; the first of Dr. Johnson's examples.

The labour'd and understanding workes of Maister Johnson; the no lesse worthy composures of the both worthily excellent Maister Beaumont and Maister Fletcher.

Webster, Pref. to the W. A. Devil, 1612.

As I then sate on this very grass, I turned my present thoughts into verse: 'tis a wish which I will repeat to you:

I in these flowery meads, &c.
When I had ended this composure, I left this place.

Warton's Angler.

Discourses on such occasions are seldom the productions of leisure, and should be read with those favourable allowances that are made to hasty composures.

Atterbury.

In the composures of men, remember you are a man as well as they; and it is not their reason, but your own, that is given to guide you.

Watts on the Mind.

7. Sedateness; calmness; tranquillity.

To whom the virgin majesty of Eve,
As one who loves and some unkindness meets,
With sweet austere composure thus reply'd. Milton, P. L.
The calmest and serenest hours of life, when the passions of nature are all silent, and the mind enjoys its most perfect composure. Watts, Logick.

8. Agreement; composition; settlement of differences.

The treaty at Uxbridge gave the fairest hopes of an happy composure. King Charles.
Vanguard! to right and left the front unfold,
That all may see, who hate us, how we seek Peace and composure. Milton, P. L.
Things were not brought to an extremity: there seems yet to be room left for a composure; hereafter there may be only for pity. Dryden.

COMPO'TATION. n. s. [compotatio, Lat.] The act of drinking or tipping together.

By desiring a secrecy to words spoke under the rose, we only mean in society compotation, from the ancient custom of symposiack meetings to wear chaplets of roses about their heads.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

If thou wilt prolong
Dire compotation, forthwith reason quits
Her empire to confusion and misrule,
And vain debates; then twenty tongues at once
Conspire in senseless jargon; nought is heard
But din and various clamour, and mad rant. Philips.

COM'POTATOR.* n. s. [from the Lat. compoto.] One who drinks together with another.

I shall yet think it a diminution to my happiness, to miss of half our companions and compotators of syllabub, &c.
Pope, Lett. to Mr. Knight.

To COMPOUND.† v. a. [compono, Latin.]1. To mingle many ingredients together in one mass.
Only compound me with forgotten dust.
*Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.*2. To form by uniting various parts.
Whosoever compoundeth any like it, shall be cut off.
Exodus, xxx.

It will be difficult to evince, that nature does not make de-compound bodies; I mean, mingle together such bodies as are already compounded of elementary, or rather of simple ones. Boyle, Serpical Chymist.

The ideas, being each but one singleperception, are easier got than the more complex ones; and therefore are not liable to the uncertainty which attends those compounded ones. Locke.

3. To mingle in different positions; to combine:
We cannot have a single image that did not enter through the sight; but we have the power of altering and compounding those images into all the varieties of picture. *Addison, Spect.*4. [In grammar.] To form one word from two or more words.

Where it and Tigris embrace each other under the city of Apania, there do they agree of a joint and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tigris. Raleigh, Hist. of the World

5. To compose by being united.

Who'd be so mock'd with glory, as to live
But in a dream of friendship?
To have his pomp, and all what state compounds,
But only painted, like his varnish'd friends. Shakspeare, Tim.

6. To adjust a difference by some recession from the rigour of claims.

I would to God all strifes were well compounded.
Shakspeare.

If there be any discord or suits between any of the family, they are compounded and appeased. Bacon, New Atlantis.

7. To discharge a debt by paying only part.
Shall I, ye gods, he cries, my debts compound?
*Gay.*To COMPOUND. *v. n.*1. To come to terms of agreement by abating something of the first demand. It has for before the thing accepted or remitted.

They were, at last, glad to compound for his safe commitment to the Tower. Clarendon.

Pray but for half the virtues of his wife;
Compound for all the rest with longer life. Dryden.

2. To bargain in the lump.
Her? a fellow will help you to-morrow: compound with him by the year. *Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.*3. To come to terms by granting something on each side.
Cornwall compounded to furnish ten oxen after Michaelmas for thirty pounds. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Once more I come to know of thee, king Harry,
If for thy ransom thou wilt now compound
Before thy most assured overthrow? Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Made all the royal stars recant,
Compound and take the covenant. Hudibras.

But useless all, when he, despairing, found
Catullus then did with the winds compound. Dryden, Juv.

Paracelsus and his admirers have compounded with the Ga-lenists, and brought a mixed use of chymical medicines into the present practice. Temple.

4. To determine. This is not in use.

We here deliver,
Subscribed by the consuls and patricians,
Together with the seal o' the senate, what
We have compounded on. Shakspeare, Coriol.

COMPOUND. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Formed out of many ingredients; not simple.

The ancient electrum had in it a fifth of silver to the gold, and made a compound metal, as fit for most uses as gold. Bacon.
Compound substances are made up of two or more simple substances. Watts, Logick.

2. [In grammar.] Composed of two or more words;
not simple.

Those who are his greatest admirers, seem pleased with them as beauties; I speak of his compound epithets. Pope.

3. COMPOUND or aggregated Flower, in botany, is such as consists of many little flowers, concurring together to make up one whole one; each of which has its style and stamina, and adhering seed, and are all contained within one and the same calyx:
such are the sunflower and dandelion. *Harris.*COMPOUND. n. s. [from the verb.] The mass formed by the union of many ingredients.

For present use or profit, this is the rule: consider the price of the two simple bodies; consider again the dignity of the one above the other in use; then see if you can make a compound, that will save more in price than it will lose in dignity of the use. Bacon, Physical Rem.

As man is a compound and mixture of flesh, as well as spirit.
South, Serm.

Love, why do we one passion call?
When 'tis a compound of them all;
Where hot and cold, where sharp and sweet,
In all their equipages meet. Swift.

COMPOUNDABLE.† adj. [from compound.] Capable of being compounded. *Sherwood.*COMPOUNDED.† n. s. [from To compound.]1. One who endeavours to bring parties to terms of agreement.

They held it to be the best course to let him alone, yea, and be compounders of peace and amity between Sancho and the barber. Shelton, D. Quix. iv. 19.

Those softeners, sweetners, compounders, and expedient-mongers, who shake their heads so strongly. Swift.

2. A mingler; one who mixes bodies.

3. An academical term for one who, having any estate or income for life of a certain value, pays extraordinary fees for the degree which he takes;
and, according to the value, is either a grand or a petty compounder.To COMPREHEND.† v. a. [comprehendo, Lat.]1. To comprise; to include; to contain; to imply.
If there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Rom. xiii. 9.

It would be ridiculous to grow old in the study of every necessary thing, in an art which comprehends so many several parts.

- Dryden, Dufresnoy.*
2. To contain the mind; to understand; to conceive.

The light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.

Rome was not better by her Horace taught,
Than we are here to comprehend his thought.
'Tis unjust, that they who have not the least notion of heroick writing, should therefore condemn the pleasure which others receive from it, because they cannot comprehend it.

Dryden.
COMPREHENSIBLE. adj. [comprehensible, Fr. comprehensibilis, Latin.]

1. Intelligible; attainable by the mind; conceivable by the understanding.

The horizon sets the bounds between the enlightened and dark parts of things, between what is and what is not comprehensible by us.

2. Possible to be comprised.

Lest this part of knowledge should seem to any not comprehensible by axiom, we will set down some heads of it.

Bacon.
COMPREHENSIBLENESS. n. s. [from comprehensible.] Capability of being understood.

Which facility and comprehensibleness must needs improve the usefulness of these expositions very considerably.

More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, Pref.
COMPREHENSIBLY. adv. [from comprehensible.]

With great power of signification or understanding; significantly; with great extent of sense. Tillotson seems to have used comprehensibly for comprehensively.

The words wisdom and righteousness are commonly used very comprehensibly, so as to signify all religion and virtue.

Tillotson.
COMPREHENSION. n. s. [comprehensio, Latin.]

1. The act or quality of comprising or containing; inclusion.

In the Old Testament there is a close comprehension of the New, in the New an open discovery of the Old.

Hooker.
The comprehension of an idea regards all essential modes and properties of it; so body, in its comprehension, takes in solidity, figure, quantity, mobility.

- Watts, Logick.*
2. Summary; epitome; compendium; abstract; abridgement in which much is comprised.

If we would draw a short abstract of human happiness, bring together all the various ingredients of it, and digest them into one prescription, we must at last fix on this wise and religious aphorism in my text, as the sum and comprehension of all.

- Rogers.*
3. Knowledge; capacity; power of the mind to admit and contain many ideas at once.

You give no proof of decay of your judgment, and comprehension of all things, within the compass of an human understanding.

- Dryden.*
4. [In rhetoric.] A trope or figure, by which the name of a whole is put for a part, or that of a part for the whole, or a definite number for an indefinite.

Harris.
COMPREHENSIVE. adj. [from comprehend.]

1. Having the power to comprehend or understand many things at once.

He must have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury tales the various manners and humours of the whole English nation in his age; not a single character has escaped him.

Dryden, Fab. Pref.
His hand unstain'd, his uncorrupted heart,
His comprehensive head; all int'rests weigh'd,
All Europe sav'd, yet Britain not betray'd.

2. Having the quality of comprising much; compendious; extensive.

So diffusive, so comprehensive, so catholic a grace is charity, that whatever time is the opportunity of any other virtue, that time is the opportunity of charity.

Sprat's Sermon.
COMPREHENSIVELY. adv. [from comprehensive.] In a comprehensive manner.

COMPREHENSIVENESS. n. s. [from comprehensive.]

1. The quality of including much in a few words or narrow compass.

Compare the beauty and comprehensiveness of legends on ancient coins.

- Addison, on Anc. Medals.*
2. The power of understanding all things.

In regard of the universality and comprehensiveness of God's will, the school-divines for our better understanding have distinguished it into divers kinds; as, his will antecedent and consequent; his will of sign; and his will of good pleasure.

Shelford's Learned Discourses, p. 188.
COMPREHENSOR. n. s. [Lat. comprehensus.] One who has attained knowledge.

Thou that wert guided by their example, be likewise heartened by their success; thou art yet a traveller, they [the saints in heaven] comprehensors; thou art panting towards that rest, which they must happily enjoy.

Bp. Hall, Soul's farewell to Earth.
COMPRESBYTERIAL. adj. [from com and presbyterial. See PRESBYTERIAL.] Relating to the presbyterian form of ecclesiastical ministration.

Wiseman.
COMPRESSIBILITY. n. s. [from compressible.] The quality of being compressible; the quality of admitting to be brought by force into a narrower compass; as air may be compressed, but water can by no violence be reduced to less space than it naturally occupies.

COMPRESSIBLE. adj. [from compress.] Capable of being forced into a narrower compass; yielding to pressure, so as that one part is brought nearer to another.

There being spiral particles, accounts for the elasticity of air: there being spherical particles, which give free passage to any heterogeneous matter, accounts for air's being compressible.

Cheyne, Phil. Prin.
COMPRESSIBLENESS. n. s. [from compressible.] Capability of being pressed close.

Dict.
COMPRESSION. n. s. [compressio, Latin.] The act of bringing the parts of any body more near to each other by violence; the quality of admitting such an effort of force as may compel the body compressed into a narrower space.

Whensoever a solid body is pressed, there is an inward tumult in the parts, seeking to deliver themselves from the compression; and this is the cause of all violent motion.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The powder in shot, being dilated into such a flame as endureth not compression, moveth in round, the flame being in the nature of a liquid body, sometimes recoiling.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Tears are the effects of the compression of the moisture of the brain, upon dilatation of the spirits.

Baron, Nat. Hist.

Merry Michael the Cornish poet piped this upon his oaten pipe for merry England, but with a mocking compression for Normandy.

Caudey's Remains.

He that shall find out an hypothesis, by which water may be so rare, and yet not be capable of compression by force, may doubtless, by the same hypothesis, make gold and water, and all other bodies, as much rarer as he pleases; so that light may find a ready passage through transparent substances.

Newton.

COMPRESSIVE.* adj. [from compress.] Having the power to compress.

This pitcher also hath his ear, which is usually called, Auricle Cordis; which (notwithstanding its name, as if it most properly appertained to the heart,) yet we must know doth rather belong to the vein, and is indeed a part thereof, and not only a part, but the principal and primary part thereof, from whence all other parts and branches do arise, as from their original; and whereunto all the blood of the body by the compressive motion of the veins, doth naturally tend, as to its ultimate hold.

Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 236.

COMPRESSURE. n. s. [from compress.] The act or force of one body pressing against another.

We tried whether heat would, notwithstanding so forcible a compressure, dilate it.

Boyle, Spring of the Air.

COMPRIEST.* n. s. [from con and priest.] A fellow-priest.

What will he then praise them for? not for any thing doing, but for deferring to do, for deferring to chastise his lewd and insolent compriests.

Milton, Apol. for Smeectymnus.

To COMPRI'NT. v. n. [comprimere, Latin.] To print together; it is commonly taken, in law, for the deceitful printing of another's copy or book, to the prejudice of the rightful proprietor.

Laban and himself were compromis'd,

That all the yearlings, which were streak'd and pied,

Should fall as Jacob's hire.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

To Co'MPROMISE.* v. n. To agree; to accord.

Any one may be convinced, that no formed church in the Christian world is more truly protestant than is the church of England; nor any which (all things compared) less compromiseth with Rome.

Puller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 458.

Co'MPROMISER.* n. s. [from compromisc.] He who makes concession.

COMPROMISSO'RIAL.† adj. [old Fr. compromissaire.] Relating to a compromise.

To Co'MPROMIT.* v. a. [Lat. compromitto.] This is our old word for compromise. "To compromit, or put unto compromise." Sherwood. It has been of late revived, especially by American writers.] To pledge; to promise.

Compromitting themselves in the name of all their country, to abide and performe all such sentence and awarde, as should by him be given.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 151.

COMPROVINCIAL. n. s. [from con and provincial.] Belonging to the same province.

At the consecration of an archbishop, all his comprovincials ought to give their attendance.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

COMPT. n. s. [compte, Fr. computus, Lat.] Account; computation; reckoning.

Your servants ever

Have theirs, themselves, and what is theirs, in compt,

To make their audit at your highness' pleasure,

Still to return your own.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

To COMPT. v. a. [compter, French.] To compute; to number. We now use To COUNT, which see.

COMPT.* adj. [Lat. comptus, Fr. coint.] Neat; spruce; and figuratively, dressed.

Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

Co'MPTLY.* adv. [from compt.] Neatly; sprucely.

Sherwood.

Co'MPTNESS.* n. s. [from compt.] Neatness.

Sherwood.

COMPTROL.† v. a. [This word is written by some authors, who did not attend to the etymology, for control; and some of its derivatives are written in the same manner, Dr. Johnson says. But when used as the title of a person in office, the assertion may be doubted. A learned friend informs me, that a charter of James V. 1538. is witnessed "compotorum nostrorum rotulatore."] To control; to overrule; to oppose.

COMPTROLLER. n. s. [from comptroll.] Director; supervisor; superiour intendent; governour.

This night he makes a supper, and a great one,

To many lords and ladies:

I was spoke to, with Sir Henry Guilford,

This night to be comptrollers. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

The comptrollers of vulgar opinions pretend to find out such a similitude in some kind of baboons. Temple.

My fates permit me not from hence to fly;

Nor he, the great comptroller of the sky. Dryden, Æn.

COMPTROLLERSHIP. n. s. [from comptroller.] Superintendence.

The gayle for stannery-causes, is annexed to the comptrollership. Crew, Surv. of Cornw.

COMPU'SATORY. adj. [from compulsor, Latin.] Having the force of compelling; coactive.

Which is no other

But to recover from us by strong hand,

And terms compulsatory, those 'foresaid lands

So by his father lost. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

COMPU'SION. n. s. [from compulsio, Latin.]

1. The act of compelling to something; force; violence of the agent

If reasons were as plenty as blackberries, I would give no man a reason on compulsion. Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

Thoughts, whither have ye led me! with that sweet

Compulsion thus transported. Milton, P. I.

Such sweet compulsion doth in musick lye,

To lull the daughters of necessity. Milton, Arcades.

2. The state of being compelled; violence suffered.

Compulsion is in an agent capable of volition, when the beginning or continuation of any action is contrary to the preference of his mind. Locke.

When the fierce foe hung on our broken rear,

With what compulsive and laborious flight

We sunk thus low? Milton, P. I.

This faculty is free from compulsion, and so spontaneous, and free from determination by the particular object. Hale.

Possibly there were others who assisted Harold, partly out of fear and compulsion. Hale on Common Law.

COMPU'SIVE.† adj. [from compulser, Fr. compulsus, Latin.] Having the power to compel; forcible:

For poison, I infus'd meer opium;

Holding compulsive perjury less sin

Than such a loathed murder would have bin.

Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays i. One.

And in all wise apprehensions the persuasive power in man to win others to goodness by instruction is greater, and more divine, than the compulsive power to restrain men from being evil by terror of the law. Milton, Animad. Ref. Def.

The Danube, vast and deep,

Supreme of rivers, to the frightful brink,

Urg'd by compulsive arms, soon as they reach'd,

New terror chill'd their veins. Phillips.

The clergy would be glad to recover their ducs by a more short and compulsive method. Swift.

COMPU'SIVELY.† adv. [from compulsive.] By force; by violence.

To forbid divorce compulsively, is not only against nature, but against law. Milton, Doct. and Discip. of Divorce.

COMPU'SIVENESS. n. s. [from compulsive.] Force; compulsion.

COMPU'SORILY. adv. [from compulsory.] In a compulsory or forcible manner; by force; by violence.

To say that the better deserver hath such right to govern, as he may compulsorily bring under the less worthy, is idle.

Bacon.

COMPU'SORY. adj. [from compulsive, French.] Having the power of necessitating or compelling.

He erresth in this, to think that actions, proceeding from fear, are properly compulsory actions; which, in truth, are not only voluntary, but free actions; neither compelled, nor so much as physically necessitated. Bp. Bramhall against Hobbes.

Kindly it would be taken to comply with a patent, although not compulsory. Swift.

COMPU'NCTION. n. s. [from compunctio, Fr. from pungo punctum, to prick, Latin.]

1. The power of pricking; stimulation; irritation.

This is that acid and piercing spirit, which, with such activity and compunction, invadeth the brains and nostrils of those that receive it. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. The state of being pricked by the conscience; repentance; contrition.

He acknowledged his disloyalty to the king, with expressions of great compunction. Clarendon.

COMPU'NCTIOUS. adj. [from compunction.] Repentant; sorrowful; tender.

Stop up th' access and passage to remorse,

That no compunctious visitings of nature

Shake my fell purpose. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

COMPU'NCTIVE. adj. [from compunction.] Causing remorse.

COMPU'PIL.* n. s. [from con and pupil.] A fellow-pupil; he who prosecutes his studies with another.

Donne, and his sometime compupil in Cambridge that married him, namely, Samuel Brook. Walton, Life of Donne.

COMPU'RGATION. n. s. [from compurgatio, Lat.] The practice of justifying any man's veracity by the testimony of another.

COMPU'RGATOR.† n. s. [Latin.] One who bears his testimony to the credibility of another.

If the lady Paula's memory wanted a compurgator, I would be one myself; it being improbable that those her eyes would burn with lust, which were constantly drowned with tears.

Fuller's Holy State, p. 26.

Lord Russel defended himself by many compurgators, who spoke very fully of his great worth.

Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time, 1683.

To make his innocence and his virtue his compurgators, and not to fight, but live down, the calumniator.

South, Sermon, vi. 97.

The next quarry, or chalk-pit, will give abundant attestation: these are so obvious, that I need not be far to seek for a compurgator. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

COMPU'TABLE. adj. [from compute.] Capable of being numbered or computed.

If, instead of twenty-four letters, there were twenty-four millions, as those twenty-four millions are a finite number; so would all combinations thereof be finite, though not easily computable by arithmetick. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

COMPU'TATE.* v. a. [Lat. computo. This should seem to be the regular verb, from which computation is formed.] To account; to reckon.

Cockeram.

COMPU'TATION. n. s. [from compute.]

1. The act of reckoning; calculation.

My princely father

Then, by just computation of the time,

Found that the issue was not his. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

2. The sum collected or settled by calculation.

We pass for women of fifty: many additional years are thrown into female computations of this nature.

Addison, Guardian.

To COMPUTE. v. a. [computo, Latin.] To reckon; to calculate; to number; to count.

Compute how much water would be requisite to lay the earth under water.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Where they did compute by weeks, yet still the year was measured by months.

Holder on Time.

Alas! not dazzled with their noon-tide ray,

Compute the morn and ev'ning to the day;

The whole amount of that enormous fame,

A tale that blends their glory with their shame.

Pope.

COMPU'TE. n. s. [computus, Lat.] Computation; calculation.

Though there were a fatality in this year, yet divers were out in their account, aberring several ways from the true and just compute; and calling that one year which perhaps might be another.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COMPU'TER. n. s. [from compute.] Reckoner; accountant; calculator.

The kalendars of these computers, and the accounts of these days, are different.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

I have known some such ill computers, as to imagine the many millions in stocks so much real wealth.

Swift.

COMPUTIST. n. s. [computiste, Fr.] Calculator; one skilled in the art of numbers or computation.

The treasurer was a wise man, and a strict computist.

We conceive we have a year in three hundred and sixty-five days exact: computists tell us, that we escape six hours.

Brown.

COMRADE. † n. s. [camerade, Fr. camerata, Ital. from camera, a chamber, one that lodges in the same chamber, qui contubernio fruitor. Formerly written by us comrade; as in Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 149. The accent on this word was formerly on either syllable. In the examples, that from Shakspeare presents it on the first; that from Milton, on the last.]

1. One who dwells in the same house or chamber.

Rather I abjure all roofs, and choose

To be a comrade with the wolf and owl.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. A companion; a partner in any labour or danger.

He permitted them

To put out both thine eyes, and fetter'd send thee

Into the common prison, there to grind

Among the slaves and asses, thy comrades,

As good for nothing else.

Milton, S. A.

A footman, being newly married, desired his comrade to tell him freely what the town said of it.

Swift.

COMROGUE.  n. s.* [from con and rogue.] A fellow-rogue; an associate in villainy.

Here will be a masque, and shall be a masque, when you and the rest of your comrogues shall sit disguis'd in the stocks.

B. Jonson, Masques.

You may seek them

In Bridewell, or the hole; here are none of your comrogues.

Massinger, Cit. Madam.

CON. † A Latin inseparable preposition, which, at the beginning of words, signifies union or association: as concourse, a running together; to convepe, to come together. Dr. Johnson has omitted to notice, that con, in compound words, is by many writers converted into co. Thus some write cotemporary, where others use contemporary; cogenial, instead of congenial; and the like. The variations of spellings, however, are now often noticed in words, which have been given without any attention to such distinction.

CON. † [abbreviated from contra, against, Lat.] A cant word for the negative side of a question; as the pros and cons.

We may enquire and judge — what may be said pro and con.

James on the Corrupt. of Script. (1688,) p. 526.

Of many knotty points they spoke,

And pro and con by turns they took.

Prior, Alma.

To CON. † v. a. [connan, Sax. to know; as in Chaucer, "Old wypen connen mochtil thinge;" that is, Old women have much knowledge. "To coune, or have connynge, scio." Prompt. Parv.]

1. To know.

Of muses, Hobinol, I conne no skill;—

But pyping low in shade of lowly grove,

I play to please mysele, all be it ill.

They say they con to heaven the high way.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. June.

2. To study; to commit to memory; to fix in the mind. It is a word now little in use, except in ludicrous language.

Pretty answers: have you not been acquainted with goldsmiths wives, and conn'd them out of rings.

Shakspeare.

Here are your parts; and I am to intreat you to con them by to-morrow night.

Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dream.

Our understanding cannot in this body arrive so clearly to the knowledge of God, and things invisible, as by orderly conning over the visible and inferior creatures.

Milton.

Shew it him written; and, having the other also written in the paper, shew him that, after he has conn'd the first, and require it of him.

Holder, Elem. of Speech.

The books of which I'm chiefly fond,

Are such as you have whilom conn'd.

Prior.

All this while John had conn'd over such a catalogue of hard words, as were enough to conjure up the devil.

Arbutnot.

3. To Con thanks; an old expression for to thank. It is the same with savoir gré.

I con him no thanks for't, in the nature he delivers it.

Shakspeare.

To CONCA'MERATE. v. a. [concamero, Lat.] To arch over; to vault; to lay concave over.

Of the upper beak, an inch and a half consisteth of one concamerated bone, bended downwards, and toothed as the other.

Greus, Museum.

CONCAMERA'TION. † n. s. [from concamerate.] Arch; vault.

The insides of these hot-houses are divided into many cells and concamerations.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 164.

What a romance is the story of those impossible concamerations, and feigned rotations of solid orbs?

Glanville, Seeps.

Gervasius Dorobernensis, in his account of the burning of Canterbury cathedral in the year 1174, says, that not only the beam-work was destroyed, but the ceiling underneath it, or concameration called caelum, being of wood, beautifully painted, was also consumed.

Warton, H. E. P. i. 303.

To CONCATENATE. † v. a. [from catena, Lat. a chain, Dr. Johnson says; who also cites no example of this old English verb. Cotgrave and Sherwood write it to concatenate, and give the old Fr. concatener.] To link together; to unite in a successive order.

Nature has concatenated our fortunes and affections together with indissoluble bands of mutual sympathy.

Burrow, Serm. ii. S. 2.

Both can only be referable to that concatenated order of events, which cannot but be best.

Harria, Three Treatises, P. II.

If Chapman affected the reputation of rendering line for line, the specious expedient of chusing a protracted measure which concatenated two lines together, undoubtedly favoured his usual propensity to periphrasis.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 444.

C O N

CONCATENATION.† n. s. [from concatenate, and old Fr. concatenation.] A series of links; an uninterrupted, unvariable succession.

Seek the consonancy and concatenation of truth.
B. Jonson, Discoveries.

In this concatenation of causes, there is a progress ordinary from the first to the last.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. (1625,) p. 104.

Meanes are not meanes, but in their concatenation, as they depend, and are chained together.

Donne, Devo. p. 497.

His quickness or volubility proceeds partly from that concatenation he useth among his syllables, by linking the syllable of the precedent word with the last of the following.

Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

The stoicks affirmed a fatal, unchangeable concatenation of causes, reaching even to the elicit acts of man's will.

South, Sermon. ii. 262.

CONCAVATION. n. s. [from concave.] The act of making concave.

CONCAVE. adj. [concavus, Latin.]

1. Hollow without angles; as, the inner surface of an eggshell, the inner curve of an arch: opposed to convex.

These great fragments falling hollow, inclosed under their concave surface a great deal of air.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Hollow.

Have you not made an universal shout,
That Tiber trembled underneath his banks,
To hear the replication of your sounds
Made in his concave shores?

Shakespeare, Julius Cæsar.

For his verity in love, I do think him as concave as a covered goblet, or a worm-eaten nut.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

CONCAVE.* n. s. [from the adjective.] An hollow; a cavity.

His wit the most exuberant of all that ever entered the concave of this ear.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

At which the universal host sent up

A shout, that tore Hell's concave.

Milton, P. L.

To CONCAVE.* v. a. [The old French language has concave, hollowed, made concave. Cotgrave.] To make hollow.

Into that western bay, concaved by vast mountains, western winds only can blow.

Seward's Lett. iv. 118.

CONCAVENESS. n. s. [from concave.] Hollowness.

Dict.

CONCAVITY.† n. s. [old Fr. concavité.] Internal surface of a hollow spherical or spheroidal body.

Niches that contain figures of white marble should not be coloured in their concavity too black.

Walton.

They have taken the impresses of these shells with that exquisite niceness, that no metal, when melted and cast in a mould, can ever possibly represent the concavity of that mould with greater exactness than these flints do the concavities of the shells, wherein they were moulded.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONCAVO-CONCAVE. adj. Concave or hollow on both sides.

CONCAVO-CONVEX. adj. [from concave and convex.] Concave one way, and convex the other.

I procured another concavo-convex plate of glass, ground on both sides to the same sphere with the former plate.

Newton.

A concavo-convex pentangular plate, part of a shell that belongs to the entrochus.

Woodward on Fossils.

CONCAVOUS.† adj. [concavus, Latin.] Concave; hollow without angles.

This, as so much leaf-gold, drawn out to a very great thinness, doth securely, tenderly, and universally wrap up, all those little hills and valleys, those convex or concaveous parts, that are within the compass of its own circumference.

Smith's Portraiture of old Age, p. 221.

C O N

The concaveous part of the liver was called lives, i. e. belonging to the family, because the signs observed there concerned themselves and their friends.

Potter, Antiq. of Greece, i. ch. 14.

CONCAVOUSLY. adv. [from concavous.] With hollowness; in such a manner as discovers the internal surface of a hollow sphere.

The dolphin that carrieth Arion is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCAUSE.* n. s. [from con and cause.] Joint cause.

The power of all these he ascribes unto the Efficient, making it in effect the only true cause of all the rest; and all the rest to be rather as instruments unto it, than concauses with it.

Fotherby, Altheim, p. 225.

To CONCEAL. v. a. [concelo, Latin.] To hide; to keep secret; not to divulge; to cover; not to detect.

He oft finds medicine, who his grief imparts;

But double griefs afflict concealing hearts.

Spenser, F. Q.

Come, Catesby, thou art sworn

As deeply to effect what we intend,

As closely to conceal what we impart.

Shakespeare, Richard III.

Ulysses himself adds, he was the most eloquent and the most silent of men: he knew that a word spoke never wrought so much good as a word concealed.

Broome.

There is but one way I know of conversing safely with all men, that is, not by concealing what we say or do, but by saying or doing nothing that deserves to be concealed.

Pope.

CONCEALABLE. adj. [from conceal.] Capable of being concealed; possible to be kept secret, or hid.

Returning a lie unto his Maker, and presuming to put off the searcher of hearts, he denied the omniscience of God, whereunto there is nothing concealable.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCEALABLENESS. n. s. [from conceal.] The state of being concealed; privacy; obscurity.

Dict.

CONCEALER.† n. s. [from conceal.] He that conceals any thing.

The lords made themselves culpable as concealers.

Sir W. Ashton, (1624,) Sup. to Cabala, p. 153.

The notice of treason, if too long smothered, draws the concealer into danger.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. Add.

They were to undergo the penalty of forgery; and the concealer of the crime was equally guilty.

Clarendon.

CONCEALING.* n. s. [from the verb.] A hiding, or keeping close.

Barret.

All ingenious concealings, or amendings, of what is originally or casually amiss, or seems so, in our bodies and outsides.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands, p. 163.

CONCEALMENT. n. s. [from conceal.]

1. The act of hiding; secrecy.

She never told her love;

But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,

Feed on her damask cheek.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

He is a worthy gentleman,

Exceedingly well read, and profited

In strange concealments.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

Few own such sentiments, yet this concealment derives rather from the fear of man than of any Being above.

Glanville.

2. The state of being hid; privacy; delitescence.

A person of great abilities is zealous for the good of mankind, and as solicitous for the concealment as the performance of illustrious actions.

Addison, Freucholder.

3. Hiding place; retreat; cover; shelter.

The choice of this holy name, as the most effectual concealment of a wicked design, supposes mankind satisfied that nothing but what is just is directed by the principles of it.

Rogers.

The cleft tree

Offers its kind concealment to a few;

Their food its insects, and its moss their nests.

Thomson.

To CONCEDE. v. a. [concedo, Latin.] To yield; to admit; to grant; to let pass undisputed.

C O N

By expurgatory animadversions we might strike our great numbers of hidden qualities; and having once a conceded list we might with more safety attempt their reasons. Brown.
This must not be conceded without limitation. Boyle.

To CONCEDE. * v. n. To admit; to grant.

We concede that self-love is the strongest and most natural love of man; and it is the greatest antagonist and enemy to the love of God. Hewyt, Sermon (1658), p. 93.

The atheist, if you concede to him that fortune may be an agent, doth presume himself safe and invulnerable. Bentley.

CONCEIT. n. s. [concept, French; conceptus, Latin.]

1. Conception; thought; idea; image in the mind.

Here the very shepherds have their fancies lifted to so high conceits, as the learned of other nations are content both to borrow their names and imitate their cunning. Sidney.

Impossible it was, that ever their will should change or incline to remit any part of their duty, without some object having force to avert their conceit from God. Hooker, b. i.

His grace looks cheerfully and smooth this morning: There's some conceit, or other, likes him well, When that he bids good-morrow with such spirit. Shakspeare.

In laughing these ever precedeth a conceit of somewhat ridiculous, and therefore it is proper to man. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Understanding; readiness of apprehension.

How often, alas! did her eyes say unto me, that they loved? and yet, I not looking for such a matter, had not my conceit open to understand them. Sidney.

The first kind of things appointed by laws humane, containeth whatsoever is good or evil, is notwithstanding more secret than that it can be discerned by every man's present conceit, without some deeper discourse and judgment. Hooker.

I shall be found of a quick conceit in judgment, and shall be admired. Wisd. viii. 11.

3. Opinion; generally in a sense of contempt; fancy; imagination; fantastical notion.

I know not how conceit may rob The treasury of life, when life itself Yields to the theft. Shakspeare, King Lear.

The bricks having first been formed in a circular mould, and then cut, before their burning, into four quarters or more, the sides afterwards join so closely, and the points concentre so exactly, that the pillars appear one intire piece.

Wotton.

All these are like so many lines drawn from several objects, that some way relate to him, and concentre in him.

Hale.

To CONCENTRE. v. a. To direct or contract towards one centre.

The having a part less to animate, will serve to concentre the spirits, and make them more active in the rest

Decay of Piety.

In thee concentring all their precious beams

Of sacred influence!

Milton, *P. L.*CONCENTRICAL. } adj. [concentricus, Lat.] Having one common centre.

CONCENTRICK. } one common centre.

If, as in water stirr'd, more circles be

Produc'd by one, love such additions take;

Those, like so many spheres, but one heav'n make;

For they are all concentrick unto thee.

Any substance, pitched steadily upon two points, as on an axis, and moving about on that axis, also describes a circle concentrick to the axis.

If the crystalline humour had been concentrick to the sclerodes, the eye would not have admitted a whole hemisphere at one view.

Ray on the Creation.

If a stone be throw'n into stagnating water, the waves excited thereby continue some time to arise in the place where the stone fell into the water, and are propagated from thence into concentrick circles upon the surface of the water to great distances.

Newton, Opt.

The manner of its concretion is by concentrick rings, like those of an onion about the first kernel.

Circular revolutions in concentrick orbs about the sun, or other central body, could in no wise be attained without the power of the Divine arm.

Bentley, Serm. 7.

CONCENTRICALLY, or CONCENTRICKLY.  adv.* [from the adj.] In a manner directing to, or exhibiting, one common centre.CONCENTUAL.  adj.* [from concent.] Harmonious.

And at that instant, like a babe, sprung up.

Our own productions flatter us: it is impossible not to be fond of them at the moment of their conception.

Dryden, Duresses.

3. Notion; idea; image in the mind.

As conceptions are the images or resemblances of things to the mind within itself, in the like manner are words or names the marks, tokens, or resemblances of those conceptions to the minds of them whom we converse with. South, Sermon.

Consult the acutest poets and speakers, and they will confess that their quickest, most admired conceptions were such as darted into their minds, like sudden flashes of lightning, they knew not how, nor whence; and not by any certain consequence, or dependence of one thought upon another, as it is in matters of ratiocination. South, Sermon.

To have right conceptions about them, we must bring our understandings to the inflexible natures and unalterable relations of things, and not endeavour to bring things to any preconceived notions of our own. Locke.

4. Sentiments; purpose.

Thou but remember'st me of my own conception. I have perceived a most faint neglect of late; which I have rather blamed as my own jealous curiosity, than as a very pretence and purpose of unkindness. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Please your highness, note His dangerous conception in this point: Not friendly by his wish to your high person, His will is most malignant, and it stretches Beyond you to your friends. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

Where Juno in the shining senate sits.

Garth.

To CONCLUDE. v. a. [concludo, Lat.]

1. To shut.

The very person of Christ therefore, for ever and the self-same, was only, touching bodily substance, concluded within the grave.

Hooker, v. § 52.

2. To include; to comprehend.

God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all.

Romans, xi. 32.

3. To collect by ratiocination.

The providences of God are promiscuously administered in this world; so that no man can conclude God's love or hatred to any person, by any thing that befalls him.

Tillotson.

4. To decide; to determine: that is to shut or close the dispute.

C O N

Youth, ere it sees the world, here studies rest;
And age, returning thence, concludes it best. Dryden.
But no frail man, however great or high,
Can be concluded blest before he die. Addison, Ovid.

5. To end; to finish.

Is it concluded he shall be protector?
It is determin'd, not concluded yet;
But so it must be, if the king miscarry. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

I will conclude this part with the speech of a counsellor of state. Bacon.

These are my theme, and how the war began,
And how concluded by the godlike man. Dryden, Æn.

6. To oblige, as by the final determination.

The king would never endure that the base multitude should frustrate the authority of the parliament, wherein their votes and consents were concluded. Bacon, Hen. VII.

If therefore they will appeal to revelation for their creation, they must be concluded by it. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

He never refused to be concluded by the authority of one legally summoned. Atterbury.

To CONCLUDE. v. n.

1. To perform the last act of ratiocination; to collect the consequence; to determine.

For why should we the busy soul believe,
When holdly she concludes of that and this;
When of herself she can no judgment give,
Nor how, nor whence, nor where, nor what she is? Davies.

The blind man's relations import no necessity of concluding, that though black was the roughest of colours, therefore white should be the smoothest. Boyle on Colours.

There is something infamous in the very attempt: the world will conclude I had a guilty conscience. Arbutnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

2. To settle opinion.

Can we conclude upon Luther's instability, as our author has done, because, in a single notion no way fundamental, an enemy writes that he had some doubtings? Atterbury.

I question not but your translation will do honour to our country; for I conclude of it already from those performances. Addison to Pope.

3. Finally to determine.

They humbly sue unto your excellence,
To have a goodly peace concluded of,
Between the realms of England and of France. Shakspeare.

4. To end.

And all around wore nuptial bonds, the ties
Of love's assurance, and a train of lies,
That, made in lust, conclude in perjuries. Dryden, Fob.
We'll tell when 'tis enough,
Or if it wants the nice concluding bout. King.

CONCLU'DENCY. n. s. [from concludent.] Consequence; regular proof; logical deduction of reason.

Judgment concerning things to be known, or the neglect and concludency of them, ends in decision. Hale.

CONCLU'DENT.† adj. [from conclude.] Decisive; ending in just and undeniable consequences.

The fourth part of excess is, concerning the communicating the authority of the chancellor too far, and making upon the matter too many chancellors, by relying too much upon reports of the masters in chancery as concludent. Bacon, Sp. on taking his place in Chancery.

Though these kind of arguments may seem more obscure, yet, upon a due consideration of them, they are highly consequential and concludent to my purpose. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CONCLU'DER.* n. s. [from conclude.] One who determines or decides.

Not forward concluders in these times.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 146.

CONCLU'DINGLY. adv. [from conclude.] With uncontroversible evidence.

Examine whether the opinion you meet with repugnant to what you were formerly embued with, be concludingly demonstrated or not. Digby.

C O N

CONCLU'SIBLE. adj. [from conclude.] Determinable; certain by regular proof.

'Tis as certainly conclusible from God's prescience, that they will voluntarily do this, as that they will do it at all. Hammond.

CONCLU'SION: n. s. [from conclude.]

1. Determination; final decision.

Ways of peaceable conclusion there are but these two certain; the one a sentence of judicial decision, given by authority thereto appointed within ourselves; the other, the like kind of sentence given by a more universal authority. Hooker.

2. The collection from propositions premised; the consequence.

The conclusion of experience, from the time past to the time present, will not be sound and perfect. Bacon, War with Spain.

And marrying divers principles and grounds,
Out of their match a true conclusion brings. Davies.

Then doth the wit
Build fond conclusions on those idle grounds;
Then doth it fly the good, and still pursue. Davies.

I only deal by rules of art,
Such as are lawful, and judge by Conclusions of astrology. Hudibras.

It is of the nature of principles, to yield a conclusion different from themselves. Tillotson.

He granted him both the major and the minor; but denied him the conclusion. Addison, Freetholder.

3. The close; the last result of argumentative deduction.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. Eccles. xii. 13.

I have been reasoning, and in conclusion have thought it best to return to what fortune hath made my home. Swift.

4. The event of experiments; experiment.

Her physician tells me,
She has pursu'd conclusions infinite
Of easy ways to die. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

We practise likewise all conclusions of grafting and inoculating, as well of wild trees as fruit trees. Bacon, New Atlant.

5. The end; the last part.

I can speak no longer; yet I will strain myself to breathe out this one invocation, which shall be my conclusion. Howell.

6. In Shakspeare it seems to signify silence; confinement of the thoughts.

Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes
And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour, Demuring upon me. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

CONCLU'SIONAL.* adj. [from conclusion.] Concluding.

Such separations of initiatory dedications, as well as conclusional separations, are made with wine. Hooper on Lent, p. 278.

*CONCLU'SIVE. adj. [from conclude.]

1. Decisive; giving the last determination to the opinion.

The agreeing votes of both houses were not by any law or reason conclusive to my judgment. King Charles.

The last dictate of the understanding is not always absolute in itself, nor conclusive to the will, yet it produces no antecedent nor external necessity. Bp. Bramhall, Answ. to Hobbes.

They have secret reasons for what they seem to do, which, whatever they are, they must be equally conclusive for us as they were for them. Rogers.

2. Regularly consequential.

Those that are not men of art, not knowing the true forms of syllogism, cannot know whether they are made in right and conclusive modes and figures? Locke.

CONCLU'SIVELY. adv. [from conclusive.] Decisively; with final determination.

This I speak only to desire Eupolis not to speak peremptorily or conclusively, touching the point of possibility, 'till they have heard me deduce the means of the execution. Bacon.

CONCLU'SIVENESS. n. s. [from conclusive.] Power of determining the opinion; regular consequence.

Consideration of things to be known, of their several weights, conclusiveness, or evidence. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To CONCOAGULATE. v. a. [from con and coagulate.] To curdle or congeal one thing with another.

The saline parts of those, upon their solution by the rain, may work upon those other substances, formerly concoagulated with them. Boyle, Experiments.

They do but coagulate themselves, without concoagulating with them any water. Boyle, Hist. of Firmness.

CONCOAGULATION. n. s. [from concoagulate.] A coagulation by which different bodies are joined in one mass.

To CONCOCT. v. a. [concoquo, Latin.]

1. To digest by the stomach, so as to turn food to nutriment.

The working of purging medicines cometh two or three hours after the medicines taken; for that the stomach first maketh a proof, whether it can concoct them. Bacon.

Assuredly he was a man of a feeble stomach, unable to concoct any great fortune, prosperous or adverse. Hayward.

The vital functions are performed by general and constant laws; the food is concocted, the heart beats, the blood circulates, the lungs play. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

The notions and sentiments of others judgment, as well as of our own memory, makes our property: it does, as it were, concoct our intellectual food, and turns it into a part of ourselves. Watts on the Mind.

2. To purify or sublime by heat; or heighten to perfection.

The small, close-lurking minister of fate,
Whose high concocted venom through the veins
A rapid lightning darts. Thomson, Summer.

3. To ripen.

The root which continueth ever in the earth, is still concocted by the earth; and fruits and grains are half a year in concocting; whereas leaves are out and perfect in a month. Bacon.

CONCOCTION. n. s. [from concoct.] Digestion in the stomach; maturation by heat; the acceleration of any thing towards purity and perfection.

This hard rolling is between concoction and a simple maturation. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The constantest notion of concoction is, that it should signify the degrees of alteration of one body into another, from crudity to perfect concoction, which is the ultimity of that action or process. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

He, though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same,
Might thence a new concoction take,
And part far purer than he came. Donne.

CONCOCTIVE.* adj. [from concoct.] Digesting by the stomach; turning food to nourishment.

It were more easy to force the concoctive stomach to turn that into flesh, which is so totally unlike that substance as not to be wrought on. Milton, Tetrach.

With keen dispatch
Of real hunger, and concoctive heat
To transubstantiate. Milton, P. L. v. 437.

The fallow ground laid open to the sun,
Concoctive. Thomson, Autumn.

CONCOLOUR. adj. [concolor, Lat.] Of one colour; without variety.

In concolour animals, and such as are confined unto the same colour, we measure not their beauty thereby; for if a crow or blackbird grow white, we account it more pretty. Brown.

CONCOMITANCE. n. s. [old Fr. concomitance, from concomitor, Lat.] Subsistence together with another thing.

The secondary action subsisteth not alone, but in concomitancy with the other; so the nostrils are useful for respiration and smelling, but the principal use is smelling. Brown.

Stain not fair acts with foul intentions; main not uprightness by halting concomitances, nor circumstantially deprave substantial goodness. Brown, Christ. Mor. i. 1.

To argue from a concomitancy to a causality, is not infallibly conclusive. Glanville, Sceptis.

The concomitand: of pain and sorrow.

More, Conj. Cabb. p. 179.

CONCOMITANT. adj. [concomitans, Lat.] Conjoined with; concurrent with; coming and going with, as collateral, not causative, or consequential.

The spirit that furthereth the extension or dilatation of bodies, and is ever concomitant with porosity and dryness. Bacon.

It has pleased our wise Creator to annex to several objects, as also to several of our thoughts, a concomitant pleasure; and that in several objects to several degrees. Locke.

CONCOMITANT. n. s. Companion; person or thing collaterally connected.

These effects are, from the local motion of the air, a concomitant of the sound, and not from the sound. Bacon.

He made him the chief concomitant of his heir apparent and only son, in a journey of much adventure. Wotton.

In consumptions, the preternatural concomitants, an universal heat of the body, a torminous diarrhoea, and hot distillations, have all a corrosive quality. Harvey on Consump.

The other concomitant of ingratitude is hard-heartedness, or want of compassion, South, Serm.

Horror stalks around,

Wild staring, and his sad concomitant,

Despair, of abject look.

Philips.

Reproach is a concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph. Addison.

And for tobacco, who could bear it?

Filthy concomitant of claret!

Prior.

Where antecedents, concomitants and consequents, causes, and effects, signs and things signified, subjects and adjuncts, are necessarily connected with each other, we may infer. Watts.

CONCOMITANTLY. adv. [from concomitant.] In company with others.

Christ, as God, hath the first (original, autocratical, judiciary power) together with the Father, and the Holy Ghost. Christ, as man, hath the second (delegated power) from the Father expressly, from the Holy Ghost concomitantly.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 7.

In the same sense, therefore, that the wicked may be said to repent, they may be said to have their prayers and services accepted; that is, the wicked antecedently so taken, and (as they speak, in sensu diviso), to wit, before the instant of their repentance, not concomitantly, and in sensu composito; the wicked as such, and while he is such, can neither repent nor pray, nor have any audience of acceptance at the throne of grace. South, Serm. ix. 301.

To CONCOMITATE. v. a. [concomitatus, Lat.] To be collaterally connected with any thing; to come and go with another.

This simple bloody spectation of the lungs, is differenced from that which concomitates a pleurisy. Harvey on Consump.

CONCORD. n. s. [old Fr. concorde; Lat. concordia; from the Gr. σύν, with, and καρδία, the heart; signifying the union of hearts.]

1. Agreement between persons or things; suitability of one to another; peace; union; mutual kindness.

Had I power, I should

Pour the sweet milk of concord into hell,

Uproar the universal peace.

Shakspeare, Macb.

What concord hath Christ with Belial?

2 Cor. vi. 15.

One shall rise

Of proud ambitious heart, who not content

With fair equality, fraternal state,

Will arrogate dominion undeserved

Over his brethren, and quite dispossess

Concord and law of nature from the earth.

Milton, P. L.

Unsafe within the wind

Of such commotion; such as, to set forth

Great things by small, if nature's concord broke,

Milton, P. L.

Among the constellations war were sprung.

Kind concord, heavenly born! whose blissful reign
Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain;
Soul of the world!

2. A compact.

It appeareth by the concord made between Henry and Roderick the Irish king. Davies on Ireland.

3. Harmony; concert of sounds.

The man who hath not musick in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons. Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

4. Principal grammatical relation of one word to another, distinct from regimen.

Have those who have writ about declensions, *concord*s, and syntaxes lost their labour?

To CONCORD.* v. n. [from the noun.] To agree.

The king was not without apprehension, that the resort of either of these into England might find too many of their old friends and associates, ready to concord with them in any desperate measure. Ld. Clarendon's Life, ii. 199.

CONCORDANCE.† n. s. [concordantia, Lat.]

1. Agreement.

But such a work nature dispos'd and gave,
Where all the elements concordance have. Browne, Brit. Past.
The tradition of divers there inhabiting, and all concordance of stories assure us, &c. Blount, Voyage into the Levant, p. 35.

2. A book which shews in how many texts of scripture any word occurs.

I shall take it for an opportunity to tell you how you are to rule the city out of a concordance. South, Sermon. Ded.

Some of you turn over a concordance, and there, having the principal word, introduce as much of the verse as will serve your turn. Swift.

An old concordance bound long since. Swift.

3. A concord in grammar; one of the three chief relations in speech. It is not now in use in this sense.

After the three concordances learned, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

CONCORDANCY.* n. s. [Lat. concordantia.] Agreement. Cockeram.

They expect to prosper in this concordancy.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 174.

CONCORDANT.† adj. [concordant, old Fr. concordans, Lat.] Agreeable; agreeing; correspondent; harmonious.

Were every one employed in points concordant to their natures, professions, and arts, commonwealths would rise up of themselves. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCORDANT.* n. s. [from the adjective.] That which is correspondent, or agreeing with.

I gave my reasons by special reciting many concordants inter partes. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 84.

CONCORDANTLY.* adv. [from concordant.] In conjunction.

They hope to lodge concordantly together an idol and an ephod. W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. p. 174.

CONCORDATE. n. s. [concordat, Fr. concordatum, Lat.]
A compact; a convention.

How comes he to number the want of synods in the Gallian church among the grievances of that concordate, and as a mark of their slavery, since he reckons all convocations of the clergy in England to be useless and dangerous? Swift.

CONCORPORAL. adj. [from concorporo, Lat. to incorporate.] Of the same body. Dict.

To CONCORPORATE.† v. a. [from con and corpus.] To unite in one mass or substance.

We are all concorporated, as it were, and made copartners of the promise in Christ. Abp. Usher, Sermon. (1621,) p. 9.

When we concorporate the sign with the signification, we conjoin the word with the spirit. Bp. Taylor, Worthy Com.

To CONCORPORATE.† v. n. To unite into one body.

As things of a like nature presently concorporate, (as we see one drop of water diffuseth itself, and runs into another,) so temptations to sin meeting with a sinful nature, are presently entertained, and as it were embodied together.

Bp. Hopkins, Expos. p. 149.

Thus we chastise the god of wine
With water that is feminine,
Until the cooler nymph abate
His wrath, and so concorporate.

Chaveland.

CONCORPORATION. n. s. [from concorporate.] Union in one mass; intimate mixture. Dict.

CONCOURSE. n. s. [concursum, Latin.]

1. The confluence of many persons or things to one place.

Do all the nightly guards,
The city's watches, with the people's fears,
The concourse of all good men, strike thee nothing? B. Jonson.

The coalition of the good frame of the universe was not the product of chance, or fortuitous concourse of particles of matter. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Vain is his force, and vainer is his skill;
With such a concourse comes the flood of ill. Dryden, Fab.

2. The persons assembled.

The prince with wonder hears, from every part,
The noise and busy concourse of the mart. Dryden, Virg.

3. The point of junction or intersection of two bodies.

So soon as the upper glass is laid upon the lower, so as to touch it at one end, and to touch the drop at the other end, making, with the lower glass, an angle of about ten or fifteen minutes; the drop will begin to move towards the concourse of the glasses, and will continue to move with an accelerated motion, 'till it arrives at that concourse of the glasses. Newton.

To CONCREATE.* v. a. [old Fr. concreer, from the
Lat. con and creo.] To create at the same time.

Upon loving God above all, and our neighbour as ourselves, hang all the law and the gospel. And this, as a rule concreated with man, is that which the apostle calls the royal law; which if we fulfil, we do well. Feltham, Rev. ii. 3.

To CONCREDE.* v. a. [Lat. concredo, part. concreditus.] To entrust; to commit upon trust.

The which reason may well be applied to excuse every Christian from swearing, who is a most high priest to the Most High God, and hath the most celestial and important matters concredited to him. Barrow, Sermon, i. S. 15.

Ecclesia commendata, so called in contradistinction to ecclesia titulata, is that church, which for the custodial charges and government thereof, is by a revocable collation concredited with some ecclesiastical person, in the nature of a trustee.

Let. to the Bp. of Rochester, (1772,) p. 2.

CONCREMATION. n. s. [from concremo, Lat. to burn together.] The act of burning many things together. Dict.

CONCREMENT. n. s. [from concreresco, Latin.] The mass formed by concretion; a collection of matter growing together.

There is the cohesion of the matter into a more loose consistency, like clay, and thereby it is prepared to the concrement of a pebble or flint. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CONCRESCENCE. n. s. [from concreresco, Lat.] The act or quality of growing by the union of separate particles.

Seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor inchoate, how any other substance should thence take concrecence hath not been taught. Rudolph, Hist. of the World.

To CONCRETE.* v. n. [concreresco, Latin.] To coalesce into one mass; to grow by the union and cohesion of parts.

The mineral or metallick matter, thus concreting with the crystalline, is equally diffused throughout the body of it.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to a cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they concreted, floated in the liquor at equal distances, in rank and file. Newton.

C O N

The blood of some who died of the plague, could not be made to concrete, by reason of the putrefaction begun.

Arbutnot.

To CONCRETE.† v. a. To form by concretion; to form by the coalition of scattered particles.

That there are in our inferior world divers bodies, that are concreted out of others, is beyond all dispute: we see it in the meteors.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

I hope he will not desert his own principle, that all fluid bodies being congealed or concreted, rest in the same form as they were in before concretion.

Bp. H. Croft on Burnet's Theory, p. 169.

Co'NCRETE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Formed by concretion; formed by coalition of separate particles into one mass.

The first concrete state, or consistent surface of the chaos, must be of the same figure as the last liquid state. Burnet.

2. [In logick.] Not abstract: applied to a subject.

A kind of mutual commutation there is, whereby those concrete names, God and man, when we speak of Christ, do take interchangeably one another's room; so that, for truth of speech, it skilleth not whether we say that the son of God hath created the world, and the son of man by his death hath saved it; or else that the son of man did create, and the son of God died to save the world.

Hooker.

Concrete terms, while they express the quality, do also either express, or imply, or refer to some subject to which it belongs; as white, round, long, broad, wise, mortal, living, dead: but these are not always noun adjectives in a grammatical sense; for a knave, a fool, a philosopher, and many other concretes, are substantives, as well as knavery, folly and philosophy, which are the abstract terms that belong to them. Watts, Logick.

Co'NCRETE. n. s. A mass formed by concretion; or union of various parts adhering to each other.

If gold itself be admitted, as it must be, for a porous concrete, the proportion of void to body, in the texture of common air, will be so much the greater.

Bentley, Serm.

CONCRETELY. adv. [from concrete.] In a manner including the subject with the predicate; not abstractly.

Sin considered not abstractedly for the mere act of obliquity, but concretely, with such a special dependance of it upon the will as serves to render the agent guilty.

Norris.

CONCRETENESS. n. s. [from concrete.] Coagulation; collection of fluids into a solid mass. Dict.

CONCRETION.† n. s. [old Fr. concretion.]

1. The act of concreting; coalition.

The mind surmounts all power of concretion, and can place in the simplest manner every attribute by itself; convex without concave; colour without superficies, &c.

Harris, Hermes, iii. 1.

2. The mass formed by a coalition of separate particles.

Some plants upon the top of the sea, are supposed to grow of some concretion of slime from the water, where the sea stirreth little.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Heat, in general, doth not resolve and attenuate the juices of a human body; for too great heat will produce concretions.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

Co'NCRETIVE. adj. [from concrete.] Having the power to produce concretions; coagulative.

When wood and other bodies petrify, we do not ascribe their induration to cold, but unto salinous spirit, or concretive juices.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCRETURE. n. s. [from concrete.] A mass formed by coagulation.

To CONCREW.* v. n. [Lat. concreresco.] To grow together. Not in use.

His faire locks —

He let to grow and griesly to concrew,

Uncomb'd, uncurl'd.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. vii. 40.

CONCUBINAGE. n. s. [concupinage, Fr. concupinatus, Lat.] The act of living with a woman not married.

C O N

Adultery was punished with death by the ancient heathens: concubinage was permitted. Broom.

CONCUBINATE.* n. s. [Lat. concupinatus.] Whoredom; fornication; concubinage.

Holy marriage in all men is preferred before unclean concubinate in any. Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, iii. § 3

CONCUBINE. n. s. [concupina, Lat.] A woman kept in fornication; a whore; a strumpet.

I know, I am too mean to be your queen;

And yet too good to be your concubine.

Shakspeare, Henry VI.

When his great friend was suitor to him to pardon an offender, he denied him; afterwards, when a concubine of his made the same suit, he granted it to her; and said, Such suits were to be granted to whores.

Bacon.

He caused him to paint one of his concubines, Campaspe, who had the greatest share in his affection.

Dryden.

The wife, though a bright goddess, thus gives place

To mortal concubines of fresh embrace.

Granville.

To CONCULCATE.† v. a. [conculco, Latin.] To tread or trample under foot.

Concupulating and trampling under foot whatsoever is named of God, he [Mahomet] advanceth his own (blasphemous, reprobate, and forlorn miscreant as he is) divine power and authority forsooth, in the devil's name, above all things whatsoever in heaven and earth.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 153

CONCULCATION. n. s. [conculcatio, Latin.] Trampling with the feet. Dict.

CONCUPISCENCE.† n. s. [old Fr. concupiscence, Lat. concupiscentia.] Our word is now rarely used in the plural number; formerly it was not uncommon.] Irregular desire; libidinous wish; lust; lechery.

We know even secret concupiscence to be sin, and are made fearful to offend, though it be but in a wandering cogitation.

Hooker.

Taking their pleasures and lustes, after their inordinate concupiscences.

Outré's Tr. of M. Cope on Proverbs, (1585,) p. 77. b.

In such sort doth Satan deal with us every day, by the means of our concupiscences sette on fire.

Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 218.

In our faces evident the signs

Of foul concupiscence; whence evil store;

Even shame, the last of evils.

Milton, P. L.

Nor can they say, that the difference of climate inclines one nation to concupiscence and sensual pleasures, another to blood-thirstiness: it would discover great ignorance not to know, that a people has been overrun with recently invented vice.

Bentley, Serm.

CONCUPISCENT. adj. [concupiscens, Latin.]

Libidinous; lecherous.

He would not, but by gift of my chaste body

To his concupiscent intemperate lust,

Release my brother!

Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

CONCUPISCENTIAL. adj. [from concupiscent.] Relating to concupiscence. Dict.

CONCUPISCIBLE.† adj. [concupiscibilis, Lat.] Impressing desire; eager; desirous; inclining to the pursuit or attainment of any thing.

To the vegetative, from which, as from a fountain, they said, the concupiscible appetite doth flow, they appointed the liver for her place.

Bryskett, Disc. of Civil. Life, (1606,) p. 47.

It is not to be supposed, there should be any predominancy of any of those passions, that proceed from the concupiscible appetite.

Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 153.

The schools reduce all the passions to these two heads, the concupiscible and irascible appetite.

South, Serm.

To CONCUR.† v. n. [concurro, Latin.] This word is the parent of a joke, reflecting on Dr. Adam

Littleton, the well-known author of a Latin dictionary; which has been so confidently asserted in Anecdotes of the English Language, as well as in other publications, that I think it right, to shew the inaccuracy of the pretended narrative, and to undeceive the wits as well as the more sober investigators of lexicography. "When Dr. Littleton was compiling his dictionary, and announced the verb concurrere to his amanuensis, the scribe, imagining that the various senses of the word would, as usual, begin with the most literal translation, said, concur, I suppose, sir; to which the doctor replied peevishly—concur! condog! The secretary, whose business it was to write what his master dictated, accordingly did his duty; and the word condog was inserted, and is actually printed as one interpretation of concurrere in the first edition, 1678, (to be seen in the British Museum,) though it has been expunged, and does not appear in subsequent editions." Peggs's Anecdotes of the English Language.—But condog had before appeared in English lexicography. In Cockeram's English dictionary, under To Agree, in the second part, (I am citing from the edition of 1642,) are these definitions, "concurrere, cohere, condog, concludere." Littleton therefore cited what had before been used, but justly discharged it afterwards; though the editors of the Cambridge dictionary in 1693 thought proper to readmit it under concurrere.]

1. To meet in one point.

Though reason favour them, yet sense can hardly allow them; and, to satisfy, both must concur. Temple.

Is it not now utterly incredible, that our two vessels, placed there antipode to each other, should ever happen to concur? Gentley, Sermon 7.

2. To agree; to join in one action, or opinion.

Acts which shall be done by the greater part of my executors, shall be as valid and effectual as if all my executors had concurred in the same. Swift, Last Will.

3. It has with before the person with whom one agrees.

It is not evil simply to concur with the heathens, either in opinion or action, and that conformity with them is only then a disgrace, when we follow them in that they do amiss, or generally in that they do without reason. Hooker.

4. It has to before the effect to which one contributes.

Their affections were known to concur to the most desperate counsels. Clarendon.

Extremes in nature equal good produce,
Extremes in man concur to general use. Pope.

5. To be united with; to be conjoined.

To have an orthodox belief, and a true profession, concurring with a bad life, is only to deny Christ with a greater solemnity. South.

Testimony is the argument; and, if fair probabilities of reason concur with it, this argument hath all the strength it can have. Tillotson.

6. To contribute to one common event with joint power.

When outward causes concur, the idle are soonest seized by this infection. Collier, on the Spleen.

CONCUR'RENCE. } n. s. [from concur.]
CONCUR'RENCY. }

We have no other measure but our own ideas, with the concurrence of other probable reasons, to persuade us. Locke.
VOL. I.

2. Agreement; act of joining in any design, or measures.

Their concurrence in persuasion, about some material points belonging to the same polity, is not strange. Hooker, Pref.

The concurrence of the peers in that fury, can be imputed to the irreverence the judges were in. Clarendon.

Tarquin the proud was expelled by an universal concurrence of nobles and people.

Swift on the Dissent, in Athens and Rome.

3. Combination of many agents or circumstances.

Struck with these great concurrences of things. Crashaw.

He views our behaviour in every concurrence of affairs, and sees us engage in all the possibilities of action. Addison, Spect.

4. Assistance; help.

From these sublime images we collect the greatness of the work, and the necessity of the divine concurrence to it.

Rogers.

5. Joint right; equal claim.

A bishop might have officers, if there was a concurrence of jurisdiction between him and the archdeacon. Ayliffe.

CONCUR'RENT.† adj. [old Fr. conclurent.]

1. Acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event; concomitant in agency.

I join with these laws the personal presence of the king's son as a concurrent cause of this reformation.

Davies on Ireland.

Every bishop, that shall be nominated by us to another bishoprick, shall from that day of nomination not presume to make any lease for three lives or one and twenty years, or concurrent lease, or any way renew any estate, &c.

K. James, Instruct. concerning Bishops, 1622.

For without the concurrent consent of all these three parts of the legislature, no such law is or can be made. Hale.

This sole vital faculty is not sufficient to exterminate noxious humours to the periphery, unless the animal faculty be concurrent with it to supply the fibres with animal spirits.

Harvey.

All combin'd,

Your beauty, and my impotence of mind;
And his concurrent flame, that blew my fire;

For still our kindred souls had one desire. Dryden, Fab.

2. Conjoined; associate; concomitant.

There is no difference between the concurrent echo and the iterant, but the quickness or slowness of the return. Bacon.

CONCUR'RENT.† n. s. [old Fr. concurrent.]

1. That which concurs; a contributory cause.

To all affairs of importance there are three necessary concurrents, without which they can never be dispatched; time, industry, and faculties. Decay of Piety.

2. Equal claim; joint right.

Stepping over to the south-sea (for the distance is, in comparison, but a step) St. Michael's Mount looketh so aloft, as it brooketh no concurrent for the highest place.

Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

CONCUR'RENTLY.* adv. [from concurrent.] In an agreeing manner.

They did not vote these special and precise means concurrently with the voice of God.

W. Alouatagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 301.

CONCUSSION.* n. s. [Lat. concussio, concussatus.] A violent agitation or shaking.

Surely he were a bold man that could sleep whiles the earth rocks him; and so were he that could give himself to a stupid security when he feels any vehement concussions of government.

Rp. Hall, Rem. p. 68.

CONCUSSED.* part. adj. [Lat. concussus.] Shaken.

Cockeram.

CONCUSSION. n. s. [concussio, Lat.]

1. The act of shaking; agitation; tremefaction.

It is believed that great ringing of bells in populous cities, hath dissipated pestilent air; which may be from the concussion of the air.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The strong concussion on the heaving tide,
Roll'd back the vessel to the island's side,

Wope, Odysse

2. The state of being shaken.

There want not instances of such an universal concussio of the whole globe, as must needs imply an agitation of the whole abyss. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONCUSSIVE. adj. [concussus, Latin.] Having the power or quality of shaking.

To CONDEMN. v. a. [condemno, Latin.]

1. To find guilty; to doom to punishment: contrary to absolve.

My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue brings in a several tale,
And every tale condemns me for a villain.

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

—Yes truly, is he, and condemn'd upon't.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.
Considered as a judge, it condemns where it ought to absolve, and pronounces absolution where it ought to condemn.

Fiddes, Sermon.

2. It has to before the punishment.

The son of man shall be betrayed unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death. St. Matt. xx. 18.

3. To censure; to blame; to declare criminal: contrary to approve.

Who then shall blame
His pester'd senses to recoil and start,
When all that is within him does condemn
Itself for being there!

Shakespeare, Macbeth.
The poet who flourished in the scene, is condemned in the ruelle. Dryden, JEn. Pref.

He who was so unjust as to do his brother an injury, will scarce be so just as to condemn himself for it. Locke.

They who approve my conduct in this particular, are much more numerous than those who condemn it.

Spectator, No. 488.

4. To fine.

And the king of Egypt put him down at Jerusalem, and condemned the land in an hundred talents of silver.

2 Chron. xxxvi. 3.

CONDEMNATION. n. s. [condemnatio, Latin.] The sentence by which any one is doomed to punishment; the act of condemning; the state of being condemned.

There is therefore now no condemnation to them. Rom. viii.

CONDEMNATORY. adj. [old Fr. condemnatoire.] Passing a sentence of condemnation, or of censure.

The evidence being clear and convictive, the doom can be no other than condemnatory. Bp. Hurd, Caus. of Consc. ii. 6.

He that passes the first condemnatory sentence, is like the incendiary in a popular tumult, who is chargeable with all those disorders to which he gave rise. Gor. of the Tongue.

CONDEMNER. n. s. [from condemn.] A blamer; a censurer; a censor.

Thus are ye all one in opinion with heretics old and new, and yet ye pretend to be condemners of them.

Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 62. b.

Some few are the only refusers and condemners of this catholic practice. Bp. Taylor, Worlthy Communicant.

Some of the later and lesser edition of divines, who would be counted great reformers of the times, because they were vehement censurers and condemners of whatever they listed to dislike or not to fancy. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 118.

But we shall meet, where our condemners
Shall not. Beaumont and Fl. Four Plays in One.

CONDENSABLE. adj. [from condensate.] That which is capable of condensation; that which can be drawn or compressed into a narrower compass.

This agent meets with resistance in the moveable, and not being in the utmost extremity of density, but condensable yet further, every resistance works something upon the mover to condense it. Digby on the Soul.

To CONDENSATE. v. a. [condenso, Latin.] To condense; to make thicker.

They say, a little critical learning makes one proud; if there were more, it would condensate and compact itself into less room. Hammond's Works, iv. 611.

To CONDENSATE. v. n. To grow thicker.

CONDENSATE. adj. [condensatus, Latin.] Made thick; condensed; compressed into less space.

Water by nature is white; yea, thickened or condensate, most white, as it appeareth by the hail and snow. Peacock.

CONDENSATION. n. s. [from condensate.] The act of thickening any body, or making it more gross and weighty. Opposite to rarefaction.

If by natural arguments it may be proved, that water, by condensation, may become earth; the same reason teacheth that earth, rarefied, may become water.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

By water-glasses the account was not regular; for, from attenuation and condensation, the hours were shorter in hot weather than in cold. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The supply of its moisture [is] by rains and snow, and dews and condensation of vapours, and perhaps by subterraneous passages. Bentley, Sermon, iv.

CONDENSATIVE. adj. [from condensate.] Having the power of condensing.

To CONDENSE. v. a. [condenso, Latin.] To make any body more thick, close, and weighty; to drive or attract the parts of any body nearer to each other. To inspissate; opposed to rarefy.

The midst was all of dark and condensed clouds.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

Moving in so high a sphere, he must needs, as the sun, raise many envious exhalations; which condensed by a popular odium, were capable to cloud the brightest merit. K. Charles.

Some lead their youth abroad, while some condense

Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense.

Dryden, Virg.

Such dense and solid strata arrest the vapour, at the surface of the earth, and collect and condense it there. Woodward.

To CONDENSE. v. n. To grow close and weighty; to withdraw its parts into a narrow compass.

The water falling from the upper parts of the cave, does presently there condense into little stones. Boyle, Scept. Chym.

All vapours, when they begin to condense and coalesce into small parcels, become first of that bigness whereby azure must be reflected, before they can constitute other colours.

Newton, Opticks.

CONDENSE. adj. [from the verb.] Thick; dense; condensed; close; massy; weighty.

They colour, shape and size

Assume, as likes them best, condense or rare. Milton, P. L.

CONDENSITY. n. s. [old Fr. condensité.] The state of being condensed; condensation; denseness; density.

CONDENSERS. n. s. [conduire, French.]

Such as stand upon high places near the sea coast, at the time of herring-fishing, to make signs to the fishers which way the shoal passeth, which may better appear to such as stand upon some high cliff, by a kind of blue colour that the fish causeth in the water, than to those in the ships. These be likewise called hurs, by likelihood of the French huyrr, exclamare, and balters. Crowl.

CONDESCENCE.* n. s. [from condescend.] Descent from superiority. See CONDESCENT.

Which passage I find cited by Cressie's Answer to Dr. Pierce, adding thus, See the condescence of this great king.

Puller's Modest. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 440.

To CONDESCEND.* v. n. [condescendre, Fr. from condescendo, Lat.]

1. To depart from the privileges of superiority by a voluntary submission; to sink willingly to equal terms with inferiours; to sooth by familiarity.

This method carries a very humble and condescending air, when he that instructs seems to be the enquirer. Watts.

2. To consent to do more than mere justice can require.

Spain's mighty monarch,
In gracious clemency does condescend,
On these conditions, to become your friend.

Dryden's Ind. Emp.

He did not primarily intend to appoint this way; but condescended to it as accommodate to their present state.

Tillotson.

3. To stoop; to bend; to yield; to submit; to become subject.

Can they think me so broken, so debas'd
With corporal servitude, that my mind ever
Will condescend to such absurd commands?

Milton, S. A.

Nor shall my resolution
Disarm itself, nor condescend to parly
With foolish hopes.

Denham, Sophy.

4. To agree to, or concur with, simply. This sense is not noticed by Dr. Johnson.

Hulst.

And therefore condescending to Blount's advice to surprize the court, he pursued, &c.

Bacon, Declar. of Id. Essex's Treason, 1601.

CONDESCENDENCE.* n. s. [condescendance, French.]

Voluntary submission to a state of equality with inferiours.

By the warrant of St. Paul's condescendence to the capacities he wrote unto, I may speak after the manner of men.

W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648), p. 31.

CONDESCENDING.* n. s. [from condescend.] Act of voluntary humiliation.

This queen of most familiar condescendings is content to be our every week's prospect.

Hammond's Works, iv. 525.

CONDESCENDINGLY.* adv. [from condescending.] By way of voluntary humiliation; by way of kind concession.

Not starting of high and intricate questions, and concluding them by subtle arguments, but familiarly and condescendingly setting out the creation, according to the most easy and obvious conceits they themselves had of those things they saw in the world.

Morr, Conj. Cabb. (1653), p. 101.

We condescendingly made Luther's works unpires by the controversy.

Atterbury.

CONDESCENSION.* n. s. [from condescend.] Voluntary humiliation; descent from superiority; voluntary submission to equality with inferiours.

It forbids pride and ambition, and vain glory; and commands humility and modesty, and condescension to others.

Tillotson.

Courtesy and condescension is an happy quality, which never fails to make its way into the good opinion, and into the very heart, and allays the envy which always attends a high station.

Atterbury, Sermons.

Raphaël, amidst his tenderness, shows such a dignity and condescension in all his behaviour, as are suitable to a superiour nature.

Addison.

CONDESCENSIVE.* adj. [from condescension.] Courteous; willing to treat with inferiours on equal terms; not haughty; not arrogant.

There is not the least of the divine favours, which, if we consider the condescensive tenderness, the clear intention, the unreserved frankness, the cheerful debonairity expressed therein, has not dimensions larger than our comprehension, colours too fair, lineaments too comely for our weak sight throughly to discern, requiring therefore our highest and our utmost thoughts.

Barrow, Sermon, vol. i. S. 8.

CONDESCENT.* n. s. [from condescend.] This is our old substantive for condescension, which also formerly appeared in condescence. Accordance; agreement; submission; condescension.

God turns the heart of men which way soever he pleases; sometimes dreadfully forward to a right down opposition; sometimes sideways to a fair accommodation; sometime circularly bringing them about to a full condescend and accordance.

Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 79.

They rather, to gratify Herodias, make way for a slight and easy a condescend.

Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

Upon the comfortable feeling of a gracious condescend, follows an happy fruition of God in all his favours.

Bp. Hall, Devout Soul, § 20.

Some worthy person that can deny himself in stooping to such a condescend.

Worthington, to Worthlib, (1661), Ep. 17.

CONDIGN.* adj. [old Fr. condigne, from condignus, Lat.] Worthy of a person; suitable; deserved; merited: it is always used of something deserved by crimes. Dr. Johnson says; which is by no means the case. Sir Thomas Elyot uses it indifferently; and other good authorities shew, that it is used strictly for praiseworthy.

Unto so excellent a prince there shall not lack hereafter condigne writers to register his acts.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 76.

Then shall they give condigne reprehensions, manifesting their faults.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 209.

Herself, of all that rule, she deemed most condigne.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. vi. 11.

They rather accrue unto the works already made, not only worthy or condigne, but also meritorious.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 202.

Unless it were a bloody martyrdom,

I never gave them condigne punishment.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Consider who is your friend, he that would have brought him to condigne punishment, or he that has saved him.

Arbutnot.

CONDIGNESS.* n. s. [from condign.] Suitableness; agreeableness to deserts.

Dict.

CONDIGNITY.* n. s. [from condign.] Merit; desert.

Condignity is much made of, [by the Church of Rome,] as being a piece for the nonce of some importance; an opposite of some spirit to affront God, and peremptorily to challenge, This is my due.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 201.

Such a worthiness of condignity, and proper merit of the heavenly glory, cannot be found in any the best, most perfect, and excellent of created beings.

Bp. Bull's Works, i. 364.

He, who prays for a thing as God has appointed, gets thereby a right to the thing prayed for; but it is a right, not springing from any merit or condignity, either in the prayer itself, or the person that makes it, to the blessing which he prays for.

South, Sermon on Extemp. Prayer.

CONDIGNLY.* adv. [from condign.] Deservedly; according to merit.

Dict.

Here you may see what persons may condignly bear the signs and tokens of arms.

Knight's Trial of Truth, (1680), p. 12.

Now. As Mercury has turn'd himself into me, so I may take the toy into my head to turn myself into Mercury, that I may swing you off condignly.

Dryden, Amphitryon.

This is a villainy through the whole world condignly punished.

L. Addison; W. Barb. p. 171.

CONDIMENT.* n. s. [condimentum, Lat.] Seasoning; sauce; that which excites the appetite by a pungent taste.

As for radish and the like, they are for condiments, and not for nourishment.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Many things are swallowed by animals rather for condiment, gust, or medicament, than any substantial nutriment.

Brown.

CONDISCIPLE.* n. s. [condisciple, old Fr. condiscipulus, Lat.] A schoolfellow, or fellow disciple.

To his right dearly beloved brethren and condisciples dwelling together. Martin on the Murr. of Priests, (1554,) II. iii.

Elmas, i. e. the Persian sorcerer, mentioned Acts, xiii. 8. and Simon surnamed Magus, his condisciple; both which used infernal arts, and were accordingly discovered and punished by the apostles. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 204.

A condisciple of his, or one that had been, hearing so much of the man, went to him. M. Casanbon, of Credulity, p. 149.

TO CONDITE. † v. a. [condio, Lat.] To pickle; to preserve by salts or aromatics.

The most innocent of them are but like condited or pickled mushrooms, which, carefully corrected, may be harmless, but can never do good. Bp. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

A good scent is the best odour, and a good name is a precious ointment which will condite our bodies best, and preserve our memories to all eternity. Paradoxical Assertions, (1659,) p. 44.

CONDITE.* adj. [Lat. conditus.] Preserved; conserved; candied.

Scotchy would fain have them use all summer, the condite flowers of succory, strawberry water, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 402.

CONDITION. n. s. [condition, Fr. conditio, Lat.]

1. Quality; that by which any thing is denominated good or bad.

A rage, whose heat hath this condition,
That nothing can allay, nothing but blood.

Shakspeare, K. J. iii.

2. Attribute; accident; property.

The king is but a man: the violet smells, the element shews to him as to me: all his senses have but human conditions.

Shakspeare.

It seemed to us a condition and property of Divine Powers and Beings, to be hidden and unseen to others. Bacon.

They will be able to conserve their properties unchanged in passing through several mediums, which is another condition of the rays of light. Newton, Opticks.

3. Natural quality of the mind; temper; temperament; complexion.

The child taketh most of his nature of the mother, besides speech, manners, and inclination, which are agreeable to the conditions of their mothers. Spenser on Ireland.

The best and soundest of his time hath been but rash; now must we look, from his age, to receive not alone the imperfections of long engrafted conditua, but the unruly waywardness that infirm and choicerick years bring with them. Shakspeare.

4. Moral quality: virtue or vice.

Jupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, adventurous, liberal, merciful, loving, and faithful, that is, giving these inclinations; and therefore those ancient kings, beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Jupiter.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Socrates espoused Xantippe only for her extreme ill conditions, above all of that sex. South.

5. State; external circumstances.

To us all,

That feel the bruises of the days before,

And suffer the condition of these times

To lay an heavy and unequal hand

Upon our humours.

TO CONDITION.* v. a. To contract; to stipulate; to agree.

It was conditioned between Saturn and Titan, that Saturn should put to death all his male children.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

CONDITIONAL. † adj. [from condition.]

1. By way of stipulation; not absolute; made with limitations; granted on particular terms.

For the use we have his express commandment, for the effect his conditional promise; so that, without obedience to the one, there is of the other no assurance. Hooker.

Many scriptures, though as to their formal terms they are absolute, yet as to their sense they are conditioned. South.

This strict necessity they simple call;

Another sort there is conditional.

Dryden, Fables.

2. [In grammar and logick.] Expressing some condition or supposition.

Hypothetical, conditional, concessive, and exceptive conjunctions seem in general to require a subjunctive mood after them.

Louth's Grammar.

CONDITIONAL. n. s. [from the adjective.] A limitation. A word not now in use.

He said, if he were sure that young man were king Edward's son, he would never bear arms against him. This case seems hard, both in respect of the conditional, and in respect of the other words. Bacon, Hen. VII.

CONDITIONALITY. n. s. [from conditional.] The quality of being conditional; limitation by certain terms.

And as this clear proposal of the promises may inspirit our endeavours, so is the conditionality most efficacious to necessitate and engage them. Decay of Piety.

1. Having the same form; using the same manners; agreeing either in exterior or moral characters; similar; resembling.

The Gentiles were not made conformable unto the Jews, in that which was to cease at the coming of Christ.

Hooker.

2. It has commonly to before that with which there is agreement.

He gives a reason conformable to the principles.

Arbutnot.

3. Sometimes with, not improperly: but to is used with the verb.

The fragments of Sappho give us a taste of her way of writing, perfectly conformable with that character we find of her.

Addison, Spect.

4. Agreeable; suitable; not opposite; consistent.

Nature is very consonant and conformable to herself.

Newton.

The productions of a great genius, with many lapses, are preferable to the works of an inferior author, scrupulously exact, and conformable to all the rules of correct writing.

Addison.

5. Compliant; ready to follow directions; submissive; peaceable; obsequious.

I've been to you a true and humble wife,

At all time to your will conformable.

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

For all the kingdoms of the earth to yield themselves willingly conformable, in whatever should be required, it was their duty.

Hooker.

Such delusions are reformed by a conformable devotion, and the well-tempered zeal of the true Christian spirit.

Sprat.

CONFORMABLY, adv. [from conformable.] With conformity; agreeably; suitably: it has to.

So a man observe the agreement of his own imaginations, and talk conformably, it is all certainty.

Locke.

I have treated of the sex conformably to this definition.

Addison.

CONFORMATION. n. s. [French; conformatio, Latin.]

1. The form of things as relating to each other; the particular texture, and consistence of the parts of a body, and their disposition to make a whole: as, light of different colours is reflected from bodies according to their different conformation.

Varieties are found in the different natural shapes of the month, and several conformations of the organs.

Haller.

Where there happens to be such a structure and conformation of the earth, as that the fire may pass freely into these spiracles, it then readily gets out.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The act of producing suitableness, or conformity to any thing: with to.

Virtue and vice, sin and holiness, and the conformation of our hearts and lives to the duties of true religion and morality, are things of more consequence than the furniture of understanding.

Watts.

CONFORMER.* n. s. [from conform.] One that conforms to, or complies with, an established doctrine.

He meant it of the publick authorized doctrine of the church of England, and of conformers unto the said doctrine of that church.

Mordaunt, App. to Cal. p. 187.

CONFORMIST.† n. s. [from conform.]

1. One that complies with the worship of the church of England; not a dissenter, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the authority of Dunton. It has, however, a general sense also; and a better example than that of Dunton, in the present meaning, may be given from the admirable author of the Christian Life.

There are too many men, who, to credit their ill designs against government, shelter themselves under the wings of the church; yet it's evident, they are either non-conformists to the church, or conformists that act against their own principle.

Scott, Serm. iv.

They were not both nonconformists, neither both conformists.

Dunton.

2. One who submits or yields.

So much have you made me a cheerful conformist to your judgement and charity. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 199.

CONFORMITY. n. s. [from conform.]

1. Similitude; resemblance; the state of having the same character of manners or form.

By the knowledge of truth, and exercise of virtue, man, amongst the creatures of this world, aspireth to the greatest conformity with God. Hooker.

Judge not what is best
By pleasure, though to nature seeming meet;
Created as thou art to nobler end,
Holy and pure, conformity divine!

Milton, P. L.

Space and duration have a great conformity in this, that they are justly reckoned amongst our simple ideas. Locke.

This metaphor would not have been so general, had there not been a conformity between the mental taste and the sensitive taste. Addison, Spect.

2. It has in some authors acith before the, model to which the conformity is made.

The end of all religion is but to draw us to a conformity with God. Decay of Piety.

3. In some to.

We cannot be otherwise happy but by our conformity to God. Tillotson.

Conformity in building to other civil nations, hath disposed us to let our old wooden dark houses fall to decay. Graunt.

4. Consistency.

Many instances prove the conformity of the essay with the notions of Hippocrates. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONFORTATION. n. s. [from conforto, a low Latin word.] Collation of strength; corroboration.

For corroboration and confortation, take such bodies as are of astringent quality, without manifest cold. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

TO CONFOUND. v. a. [confondre, Fr. confundo, Latin.]

1. To mingle things so that their several forms or natures cannot be discerned.

Let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. Gen. xi. 7.

Two planets rushing from aspect malign
Of fiercest opposition, and mid sky
Should combat, and their jarring spheres confound.

Milton, P. L.

2. To perplex; to compare or mention without due distinction.

A fluid body and a wetting liquor are wont, because they agree in many things, to be confounded. Boyle.

They who strip not ideas from the marks men use for them, but confound them with words, must have endless dispute. Locke.

3. To disturb the apprehension by indistinct words or notions.

I am yet to think, that men find their simple ideas agree, though, in discourse, they confound one another with different names. Locke.

4. To throw into consternation; to perplex; to terrify; to amaze; to astonish; to stupify.

So spake the son of God; and Satan stood

A while as mute, confounded what to say.

Milton, P. R.

Now with furies surrounded,

Despairing, confounded,

He trembles, he glows,

Amidst Rhodope's snows.

Pope, St. Cecilia.

5. To destroy; to overthrow.

The sweetest honey

Is loathsome in its own deliciousness,

And in the taste confounds the appetite.

Shakspeare.

The gods confound thee! do'st thou hold there still!

Shakspeare.

Let them be confounded in all their power and might, and let their strength be broken.

Dan. xxi.

So deep a malice to confound the race

Of mankind in one root.

Milton, P. L.

CONFOUNDED. particip. adj. [from confound.] Heatful; detestable; enormous; odious: a low cant word.

A most confounded reason for his brutish conception. Grew.

Sir, I have heard another story,

'He was a most confounded Tory;

And grew, or he is much bely'd,

Extremely dull before he dy'd.

Swift.

CONFOUNDEDLY. adv. [from confounded.] Hatefully; shamefully: a low or ludicrous word.

You are confoundedly given to squirting up and down, and chattering. L'Esrange.

Thy speculations begin to smell confoundedly of woods and meadows. Addison, Spect.

CONFOUNDEDNESS. n. s. [from confounded.] State of being confounded or vanquished.

Of the same strain is their witty descendant of my confoundedness.

Milton, Animad. Rem. Def.

CONFOUNDER. n. s. [from confound.]

1. He who disturbs, perplexes, terrifies, or destroys.

Ignorance—the darkener of man's life, the disturber of his reason, and common confounder of truth. B. Jonson, Discov.

In the confounders of those houses, [there was] some detestation of the vices of friars, more desire of the wealth of friars.

Fuller's Holy War, p. 242.

2. He who mentions things without due distinction.

The confounder of our church with Charenton-Temple, is now at leisure to finish and polish those precious manuscripts, wherewith he adorns certain of his elect ladies' closets here.

Dean Martin, Letters, (1690,) p. 71.

CONFRATERNITY. n. s. [from con and fraternitas, Latin.] A brotherhood; a body of men united for some religious purpose.

We find days appointed to be kept, and a confraternity established for that purpose with the laws of it. Sidlingfleet.

The confraternities are in the Roman church, what corporations are in a commonwealth.

Breunt, Saul and Sam. at Tabor, p. 264.

CONFRERE. n. s. [Fr. confrere.] One of the same religious order.

It was enacted, that none of the brethren or confreres of the said religion within this realm of England, and land of Ireland, should be called knights of Rhodes. Weever.

CONFRICATION. n. s. [from con and frico, Lat.] The act of rubbing against any thing.

It hath been reported, that ivy hath grown out of a stag's horn; which they suppose did rather come from a confrication of the horn upon the ivy, than from the horn itself. Bacon.

TO CONFRONT. v. a. [confronter, French.]

1. To stand against another in full view; to face.

He spoke, and then confronts the bull;

And on his ample forehead, aiming full,

The deadly stroke descends.

Dryden, Virg.

2. To stand face to face, in opposition to another.

The East and West churches did both confront the Jews and concur with them. Hooker.

Blood hath bought blood, and blows have answer'd blows,
Strength match'd with strength, and power confronted power.

Shakspeare, K. John.

Bellona's bridegroom, lapt in proof,

Confronted him with self comparisons,

Point against point rebellious, arm 'gainst arm.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

3. To oppose one evidence to another in open court.

We began to lay his unkindness unto him; he seeing himself confronted by so many, went not to denial, but to justify his cruel falshood. Sidney.

4. To compare one thing with another.

When I confront a medal with a verse, I only shew you the same design executed by different hands. Addison on Medals.

CONFRONTATION. n. s. [French.] The act of bringing two evidences face to face.

The argument would require a great number of comparisons, confrontations, and combinations, to find out the connection between the two manners.

Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 44.

To CONFUSE. v. a. [confusus, Latin.]

1. To disorder; to disperse irregularly.

Thus roving on

In confus'd march forlorn, the adventurous bands —
View'd first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest.

Milton, P. L.

2. To mix, not separate.

At length an universal hubbub wild,
Of stunning sounds and voices all confus'd,
Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear.

Milton, P. L.

3. To perplex, not distinguish; to obscure.

We may have a clear and distinct idea of the existence of many things, though our ideas of their intimate essences and causes are very confused and obscure.

Watts, Logick.

4. To hurry the mind.

Confus'd and sadly she at length replies.

Pope, Statius.

CONFUSE.* adj. [Lat. confusus.] Mixed; confounded; not separated.

Hudoc.

A confuse cry, shout, or noise of sundry tongues.

Barret.

CONFUSEDLY. adv. [from confused.]

1. In a mixed mass; without separation.

These four nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together.

Ralegh, Hist.

2. Indistinctly; one mingled with another.

The inner court with horror, noise and tears,
Confus'dly fill'd; the women's shrieks and cries
The arch'd vaults re-echo.

Denham.

On mount Vesuvius next he fix'd his eyes,
And saw the smoking tops confus'dly rise;
A hideous ruin!

Addison on Italy.

I viewed through a prism, and saw them most confusedly defined, so that I could not distinguish their smaller parts from one another.

Newton, Opticks.

Heroes and heroines shouts confus'dly rise,
And base and treble voices strike the skies.

Pope.

3. Not clearly; not plainly.

He confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion.

Clarendon.

4. Tumultuously; hastily; not deliberately; not exactly.

The propriety of thoughts and words, which are the hidden beauties of a play, are but confusedly judged in the vehemence of action.

Dryden.

CONFUSEDNESS.* n. s. [from confused.] Want of distinctness; want of clearness.

Hitherto these titles of honour carry a kind of confusedness, and rather betokened a successive office than an established dignity.

Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Yet do I see through this confusedness some little comfort.

Beaumont and Fl. Woman-Hater.

The cause of the confusedness of our notions, next to natural inability, is want of attention.

Norris.

CONFUSELY.* adv. [from the adj. confuse.] Obscurely, not with sufficient declaration; without order; in a mixed manner.

Barret.

CONFUSION. n. s. [from confuse.]

1. Irregular mixture; tumultuous medley.

God, only wise, to punish pride of wit,
Among men's wits hath this confusion wrought;
As the proud tow'r, whose points the clouds did hit,
By tongues confusion was to ruin brought.

Davies.

2. Tumult; disorder.

God is not a god of sedition and confusion, but of order and of peace.

Hooker, Preface.

This is a happier and more comely time,
Than when these fellows run about the streets

Crying confusion.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

3. Indistinct combination.

The confusion of two different ideas, which a customary connexion of them in their minds hath made to them almost one, fills their head with false views, and their reasonings with false consequences.

Locke.

4. Overthrow; destruction.

The strength of their illusion,
Shall draw him in to his confusion.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

5. Astonishment; distraction of mind; hurry of ideas.

Confusion dwelt in ev'ry face,

And fear in ev'ry heart,

When waves on waves, and gulphs in gulphs,

O'ercame the pilot's art.

Speciator, No. 489.

CONFUTABLE. adj. [from confute.] Possible to be disproved; possible to be shewn false.

At the last day, that inquisitor shall not present to God a bundle of calumnies, or confutable accusations; but will offer unto his omniscience a true list of our transgressions.

Brown.

CONFUTANT.* n. s. [from confute.] One who undertakes to confute another.

Now that the confutant may also know as he desires, what force of teaching there is sometimes in laughter.

Milton, Apology for Smectym.

CONFUTATION. n. s. [confutatio, Latin.] The act of confuting; disproof.

A confutation of atheism from the frame of the world.

Bentley.

To CONFUTE. v. a. [confuto, Latin.] To convict of error or falshood; to disprove.

He could on either side dispute;

Confute, change hands, and still confute.

Hudibras.

For a man to doubt whether there be any hell, and thereupon to live as if there were none, but, when he dies, to find himself confuted in the flames, must be the height of woe.

South.

CONFUTEMENT.* n. s. [from confute.] Disproof.

An opinion held by some of the best among reformed writers without scandal or confutement.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

CONFUTER.* n. s. [from confute.] One who convicts another of mistake.

We have promised that their own dearest doctors and divines should be their confuters.

And this is the immediate reason here why our enraged confuter, that he may be as perfect a hypocrite as Caiaphas, ere he be a high priest, cries out, "Horrid blasphemy!" and, like a recreant Jew, calls for stones.

Milton, Apology for Smectym.

CONGE.* n. s. [congé, French.] Our word is often written congie.]

1. Act of reverence; bow; courtesy.

Because they cannot ride a horse, which every clown can do; salute and court a gentlewoman, eny at table, cringe, and make congas, which every swabber can do; they are laughed to scorn!

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 127.

The captain salutes you with congé profound,

And your ladyship curtsies half way to the ground.

Swift.

2. Leave; farewell.

So, courteous congé both did give and take,

With right hands plighted, pledges of good will.

Spenser, F. Q.

To Co'NGE.* v. n. [from the noun.] To take leave.

I have conged with the duke, and done my adieu with his nearest.

Shakspeare, All's well.

Then with short flight up to the oak he springs,

Where he thrice conged after his ascent.

More, Song of the Soul, ii. 63.

CONGE D'ELIRE is French; and signifies, in common law, the king's permission royal to a dean and chapter, in time of vacation, to choose a bishop. The king, as sovereign patron of all archbishopricks, bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical benefices, had, in ancient times, the free appointment of all ecclesiastical dignities; investing them first per baculum & annulum, and afterwards by his letters patent. In process of time he made the election over to others, under certain forms and conditions; as, that they should, at every vacation, before they choose, demand of the king a congè d'elire, that is, licence to proceed to election. Coxet.

C O N

A woman, when she has made her own choice, for form's sake, sends a congè d'elire to her friends. Spectator, No. 475.

CONGE, n. s. [In architecture.] A moulding in form of a quarter round, or a cavetto, which serves to separate two members from one another: such is that which joins the shaft of the column to the cincture. Chambers.

To CONGEAL, † v. a. [Econgelo, Latin.] Formerly the word was also accented on the first syllable; as in the passage from Shakspeare's Rich. III. And in the old tragedy of Loecine, ascribed to Shakspeare; as also in Milton's Comus.]

1. To turn, by frost, from a fluid to a solid state.

What more miraculous thing may be told,
Than ice, which is congèal'd with senseless cold,
Should kindle fire by wonderful device? Spenser.

I'll pass the frozen zone, where icy flakes
Do lie, like mountains in the congèal'd sea.

Tragedy of Loecine.

Wherewith she freez'd her foes to congèal'd stone.
Milton, Com. 449.

In whose capacious womb

A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congèal'd. Thomson, Winter.

2. To bind or fix, as by cold.

Oh, gentlemen, see! see, dead Henry's wounds
Open their congèal'd mouths, and bleed afresh.

Shakspeare, R. III.

Too much sadness hath congèal'd your blood. Shakspeare.

To CONGEAL, v. n. To concreate; to gather into a mass by cold.

In the midst of molten lead, when it beginneth to congèal, make a little dent, into which put quicksilver wrapt in linen, and it will fix and run no more, and endure the hammer.

Bacon.

When water congèals, the surface of the ice is smooth and level, as the surface of the water was before. Burnet's Theory.

CONGEALMENT, † n. s. [from congèal.] The clot formed by congelation; concretion.

Enter the city, clip your wives, your friends;
Tell them your feats, whilst they with joyful tears
Wash the congèalment from your wounds.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

We do not see that while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congèalment of "wood, hay, and stubble."

Milton, Arcopagitica.

CONGEALABLE, adj. [from congèal.] Susceptible of congelation; capable of losing its fluidity.

The consistencies of bodies are very divers; dense, rare, tangible, pneumatical, fixed, hard, soft, congèalable, not congèalable, liquefiable, not liquefiable. Bacon.

The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fixable in the fire, and congèalable again by cold into brittle glebes or crystals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONGELATION, n. s. [from congèal.]

1. Act of turning fluids to solids, by cold.

The capillary tubes are obstructed either by outward compression or congelation of the fluid. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

There are congelations of the redundant water, precipitations, and many other operations. Arbuthnot on Air.

2. State of being congèaled, or made solid, by cold.

Many waters and springs will never freeze; and many parts in rivers and lakes, where there are mineral eruptions, will still persist without congelation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

C O N

CONGEMINATION,  n. s.* [old Fr. congemination, from the Lat. congemination.] A doubling, or often repeating; a figure of speech, as epizeuxis.

Colgrave.

CONGENER, n. s. [Latin.] Of the same kind or nature.

The cherry-tree has been often grafted on the laurel, to which it is a congener. Miller.

CONGENERACY,  n. s.* [from congener.] Similarity of origin.

That they are ranged neither according to the merit, nor congeneracy, of their conditions.

More, Expos. Seven Ch. p. 172.

CONGENEROUS, adj. [congener, Latin.] Of the same kind; arising from the same original.

Those bodies, being of a congenurous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their nature. Brown, Vulg. Err.

From extreme and lasting colds proceeds a great run of apoplexies, and other congenurous diseases. Arbuthnot on Air.

CONGENEROUSNESS, † n. s. [from congenurous.] The quality of being from the same original; belonging to the same class. Dict.

Rational means, and persuasive arguments, whose force and strength must lie in their congenurousness and suitableness with the ancient ideas and inscriptions of truth upon our souls.

Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, (1677,) p. 84.

CONGENIAL, adj. [con and genus, Lat.] Partaking of the same genius; kindred; cognate; in Swift it is followed by with.

He sprung, without any help, by a kind of congenial composition, as we may term it, to the likeness of our late sovereign and master. Wotton.

You look with pleasure on those things which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions. Dryden, Ded. of Juvenal.

Smit with the love of sister arts we came,
And met congenial, mingling flame with flame. Pope.

He acquires a courage, and stiffness of opinion, not at all congenial with him. Swift.

CONGENIALITY, † n. s. [from congenial.] Participation of the same genius; cognation of mind, or nature.

Painters and poets have always had a kind of congeniality.
Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

CONGENIALNESS, n. s. [from congenial.] Cognation.

CONGENIOUS,  adj.* [con and genus, Lat.] Of the same kind. Not now in use.

In the blood thus drop'd there remains a spirit of life congenious to that in the body. Hales, Rem. p. 288.

CONGENITE, adj. [congenitus, Latin.] Of the same birth; born with another; connate; begotten together.

Many conclusions of moral and intellectual truths seem, upon this account, to be congenite with us, connatural to us, and engraven in the very frame of the soul.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Did we learn an alphabet in our embryo-state! And how comes it to pass, that we are not aware of any such congenite apprehensions? Hanville's Scepstia.

CONGER, † n. s. [congrus, Latin, γόγγρος, Gr. formed of γρᾶω, to eat, the fish being very voracious.] The sea-eel.

Many fish, whose shape and nature are much like the eel, frequent both the sea and fresh rivers; as the mighty conger, taken often in the Severn. Walton's Angler.

CONGERIES, † n. s. [Latin.] A mass of small bodies heaped up together.

Congeries [is] a multiplication or heaping together of many words, signifying divers things of like nature.

Peacham, Garden of Eloquence, (1577,) Q. ij.

The air is nothing but a congeries or heap of small, and for the most part, of flexible particles, of several sizes, and of all kinds of figures. Boyle.

To CONGE'ST.† v. a. [congro, congestum, Lat.] It is very remarkable, that of this well established word Dr. Johnson should have given neither authority nor example; merely introducing it into his dictionary, as if before unnoticed or unused.] To heap up; to gather together.

It shewed his bounty and magnificence in congesting matter for building the temple, as gold, silver, brass, &c.

Raleigh, Maxims of State.
Thou that didst order this congested heap,
When it was chaos; 'twixt thy spacious palms
Forming it to this vast rotundity.

Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays in One.
In which place is congested the whole sum of all those heads, which before I have collected. Fotherby, Athcom. p. 253.
He had congested and amassed together such infinite monies.

Fotherby, Athcom. p. 205.
Yet his congested wealth shall melt like snow.

Sandys, Paraphr. of Job, p. 24.
When thou, O Lord, the rivers didst divide,
And on the chariots of salvation ride,
Through the congested billows of the seas.

Sandys, Sacred Songs, p. 21.
CONGE'STIBLE. adj. [from congest.] That may be heaped up. Dict.

CONGE'STION.† n. s. [congestio, Latin.]

1. A collection of matter, as in abscesses and tumours. Quincy.

Wiseman.
Congestion is then said to be the cause of a tumour, when the growth of it is slow, and without pain.

2. A gathering together; formation of a mass.
So is the opinion of some divines, that, until after the flood, were no mountains, but that by congestion of sand, earth, and such stuff as we now see hills strangely freighted with, in the waters they were first cast up.

Seldon, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 9.
CO'NGIARY. n. s. [congiarium, from congius, a measure of corn, Lat.] A gift distributed to the Roman people or soldiery, originally in corn, afterwards in money.

We see on them the emperor and general officers, standing as they distributed a congiary to the soldiers or people. Addison.

To CONGLA'CIATE. v. n. [conglaciatus, Latin.] To turn to ice.

No other doth properly conglaciate but water; for the determination of quicksilver is properly fixation, and that of milk coagulation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONGLACIA'TION. n. s. [from conglaciate.] The state of being changed, or act of changing into ice.

If crystal be a stone, it is concreted by a mineral spirit and lapidifical principles; for, while it remained in a fluid body, it was a subject very unfit for proper conglaciation. Brown.

To CONGLOBATE.† v. a. [conglobatus, Latin.] This is not a word of frequent occurrence; but it has been admirably employed by Johnson himself, who also has adopted, in imitation of it, the verb conglobulate. See To CONGLOBULATE.] To gather into a hard firm ball.

The testicle, as is said, is one large conglobated gland, consisting of soft fibres, all in one convolution. Grew.

He, who is not accustomed to require rigorous accuracy from himself, will scarcely believe how much a few hours take from certainty of knowledge, and distinctness of imagery; how the succession of objects will be broken; how separate parts will be confused; and how many particular features and discriminations will be compressed and conglobated into one gross and general idea. Johnson, Journ. to the West Islands.

CO'NGLOBATE.† adj. [from the verb.] It has escaped Dr. Johnson, that Dryden uses this word, and places the accent on the second syllable. Moulded into a firm ball, of which the fibres are not distinctly visible.

Heaven's gifts, which do like falling stars appear
Scatter'd in others; all, as in their sphere,
Were fix'd conglobate in his soul.

Dryden on the Death of Lt. Hastings.
Fluids are separated from the blood in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.
CO'NGLOBATELY. adv. [from conglobate.] In a spherical form. Dict.

CONGLOBA'TION. n. s. [from conglobate.] A round body; collection into a round mass.

In this spawn are discerned many specks, or little conglobations, which in time become black. Brown.

To CONGLO'BE. v. a. [conglobo, Lat.] To gather into a round mass; to consolidate in a ball.

Then [he] founded, then conglob'd
Like things to like. Milton, P. L.

For all their centre found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around;
Not closer, orb in orb conglob'd, are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen. Pope, Dunciad.

To CONGLO'BE. v. n. To coalesce into a round mass.

Thither they
Hasted with glad precipitance, up-roll'd
As drops on dust conglobing from the dry. Milton, P. L.

To CONGLO'BULATE.* v. n. [from Lat. con and globulus.] To gather together into a little round mass.

Swallows certainly sleep all the winter. A number of them conglobulate together, by flying round and round, and then all in a heap throw themselves under water, and lye in the bed of a river. Johnson, in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

To CONGLO'MERATE. v. a. [conglomerare, Lat.] To gather into a ball, like a ball of thread; to inveave into a round mass.

The liver is one great conglomerated gland, composed of innumerable small glands, each of which consisteth of soft fibres, in a distinct or separate convolution. Grew, Cosmol.

CONGLO'MERATE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Gathered into a round ball, so as that the constituent parts and fibres are distinct.

Fluids are separated in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

2. Collected; twisted together.
The beams of light, when they are multiplied and conglomerate, generate heat. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONGLOMERA'TION. n. s. [from conglomerate.]

1. Collection of matter into a loose ball.

2. Intertexture; mixture.

The multiplication and conglomeration of sounds doth generate refraction of the air. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CONGLU'TINATE.† v. a. [conglutino, Latin.] This is one of our oldest verbs, (though given without any authority by Dr. Johnson,) being in Huloet's dictionary. To cement; to reunite; to heal wounds.

Without an infinite power God could not conjoin, cement, conglutinate, and incorporate them [our bodies] again into the same flesh. Pearson on the Creed, Art. XI.

Starch, which is nothing but the flower of bray, will make a clinging paste, the which will conglutinate some things, though not every thing.

Sir W. Petty, Sprat's Hist. R. Soc. p. 293.
To CONGLU'TINATE. v. n. To coalesce; to unite by the intervention of a callus.

CONGLU'TINATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Joined together.

All these together conglutinate, and effectually executed, maketh a perfect definition of justice.

Sir T. Elyot, Ger. fol. 142.
CONGLUTINA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. conglutination.]

1. The act of uniting wounded bodies; reunion; healing.

The cause is a temperate conglutination; for both bodies are clammy and viscous, and do bridle the deflux of humours to the hurts.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To this elongation of the fibres is owing the union or conglutination of parts separated by a wound. Arbuth. on Aliments.

2. Simply; junction; union.

The common name of Spain, no doubt, hath been a special means of the better union and conglutination of the several kingdoms of Castile, Arragon, &c.

Bacon, of the Union of England and Scotland.

CONGLUTINATIVE. adj. [from conglutinate.] Having the power of uniting wounds.

CONGLUTINATOR. n. s. [from conglutinate.] That which has the power of uniting wounds.

The osteocolla is recommended as a conglutinator of broken bones.

Woodward on Fossils.

CONGRATULANT. adj. [from congratulate.] Rejoicing in participation; expressing participation of another's joy.

Forth rush'd in haste the great consulting peers,

Rais'd from the dark divan, and with like joy

Congratulant approach'd him.

Milton, P. L.

To CONGRATULATE. † v. a. [gratulo, Latin.]

1. To compliment upon any happy event; to express joy for the good of another.

He sent Hadoram his son to king David, to congratulate him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him.

1 Chron. xviii. 10.

I congratulate our English tongue, that it has been enriched with words from all our neighbours.

Watts, Logick.

2. It has sometimes the accusative case of the cause of joy, and to before the person.

An ecclesiastical union within yourselves, I am rather ready to congratulate to you.

Sprat's Sermon.

The subjects of England may congratulate to themselves, that the nature of our government and the clemency of our king secure us.

Dryden, Pref. to Aurengzebe.

To CONGRATULATE. v. n. To rejoice in participation.

I cannot but congratulate with my country, which hath outdone all Europe in advancing conversation.

Swift.

CONGRATULATION. † n. s. [from congratulate.]

1. The act of professing joy for the happiness or success of another.

Wherefore then serves all this, but to stir us up to a threefold use; of holy thankfulness, of pity, of indignation? The two first are those "duo ubera sponse," the two breasts of Christ's spouse, as Barnard calls them, congratulation and compassion.

Bp. Hall, Sermon Works, ii. 360.

All our good old friends that are gone to heaven before us, shall meet us as soon as we are landed upon the shore of eternity; and, with infinite congratulations for our safe arrival, shall conduct us into the company of the patriarchs and prophets, apostles and martyrs.

Scott, Christian Life, i. i.

What unspeakable rejoicing and congratulations will there be between us.

Ibid. i. iii.

2. The form in which joy for the happiness of another is expressed.

CONGRATULATOR.  n. s.* [Lat.] He who offers congratulation to another.

Nothing more fortunately auspicious could happen to us, at our first entrance upon the government, than such a congratulator.

Milton, Lett. of State.

CONGRATULATORY. † adj. [from congratulate.] Expressing joy for the good fortune of another.

Letters are—consolatory, monitory, or congratulatory.

Howell, Lett. i. i. i.

A solemn congratulatory procession of all the monks marching out to meet and receive him.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 423.

To CONGRE'E. v. n. [from gre, French.] To agree; to accord; to join; to unite. Not in use.

For government,

Put into parts, doth keep in one consent,

Congreeing in a full and natural close.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

To CONGRE'ET. v. n. [from con and gree.] To salute reciprocally. Not in use.

My office hath so far prevail'd,

That face to face, and royal eye to eye,

You have congregated.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

To CONGREGATE. v. a. [congrego, Lat.] To collect together; to assemble; to bring into one place.

Any multitude of Christian men congregated, may be termed by the name of a church.

Hooker.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the sea.

Rollin, Hist. of the World.

Tempests themselves, high seas, and howling winds,

The gutter'd rocks and congregated sands,

As having sense of beauty, do omit

Their mortal natures.

Shakspeare, Othello.

The dry land, earth; and the great receptacle

Of congregated waters, he call'd seas;

And saw that it was good.

Milton, P. L.

Heat congregates homogeneal bodies and separates heterogeneous ones.

Newton, Opticks.

Light, congregated by a burning glass, acts most upon sulphureous bodies, to turn them into fire.

Newton, Opticks.

To CONGREGATE. v. n. To assemble; to meet; to gather together.

He rails,

Ev'n there where merchants most do congregate,

On me, my bargains.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

'Tis true, (as the old proverb doth relate)

Equals with equals often congregate.

Denham.

CONGREGATE. † adj. [from the verb.] Collected; compact.

Who now, in th' highest sky,

Was placed in his principall estate,

With all the gods about him congregate.

Spenser, F. Q. vii. vi. 19.

Where the matter is most congregate, the cold is the greater.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONGREGATION. † n. s. [from congregate.]

1. The act of collecting.

The means of reduction by the fire, is but by congregation of homogeneal parts.

Bacon.

2. A collection; a mass of various parts brought together.

This brave o'erhanging firmament appears no other thing to me, than a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours.

Shakspeare.

3. An assembly met to worship God in publick, and hear doctrine.

The words which the minister first pronounceth, the whole congregation shall repeat after him.

Hooker.

The practice of those that prefer houses before churches, and a conventicle before the congregation.

South.

If those preachers, who abound in epiphonemas, would look about them, they would find part of their congregation out of countenance, and the other asleep.

Swift.

4. A distinct academical assembly; by the members of which, particular business of the university is transacted. See also CONVOCATION.

By a composition entered into between the university of Oxford and the founder of New College, it was agreed that the fellows thereof should be admitted to all degrees in the university without asking any grace of the congregation of masters.

Le Neve, Lives of Eng. Bishops, P. I. p. 84.

CONGREGATIONAL. † adj. [from congregation.]

1. Pertaining to a congregation or assembly of such Christians as hold every congregation to be a separate and independent church.

The consistorial and congregational pretences were twins of the same birth; though the younger served the elder; and, being much overpowered, sunk in the stream of time, till it appeared again in this unhappy age, amongst the ghosts of so many revived errors, that have escaped from their tombs, to walk up and down, and disturb the world.

Mr. Baxter—takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren. Bp. Sancroft, Serm. p. 13.
Bp. Nicholson to Mr. Yates, 1699.

Every parish had a congregational or parochial presbytery for the affairs of its own circle. Warton, Notes on Milton's Poems.

2. Publick; general; respecting the audience assembled in the church.

He [Abp. Parker] directs a distinct and audible mode of congregational singing. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 176.
My subject is only general congregational psalmody.

Mason on Church Music, p. 196.

CONGRESS.† n. s. [congressus, Lat.]

1. A meeting; a shock; a conflict.

Here Pallas urges on, and Lausus there;
Their congress in the field great Jove withstands,
Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands. Dryden, An.

From these laws may be deduced the rules of the congresses and reflections of two bodies. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

2. A meeting, not as a shock, or conflict, but of ceremony; an introduction to others.

In modern practice, especially with us in England, that ceremony is used as much in our adieus, as in the first congress.

Sir K. Digby, Annol. on Rel. Med. p. 76.

3. An appointed meeting for settlement of affairs between different nations: as, the congress of Cambray.

4. A coming together, in a sexual meaning. See CONGRESSIVE.

The congress between the bitch and the wolf was immediate. Pennant.

CONGREGATION.* n. s. [old Fr. congression.] Company; an assembly, or meeting together. Cotgrave.

CONGRESSIVE. adj. [from congress.] Meeting; encountering; coming together.

If it be understood of sexes conjoined, all plants are female; and if of disjoined and congressive generation, there is no male or female in them. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CONGRUE. v. n. [from congruo, Lat.] To agree; to be consistent with; to suit; to be agreeable. Not in use.

Our sovereign process imports at full,
By letters congruing to that effect,
The present death of Hamlet. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CONGRUENCE.† n. s. [congruentia, Lat.] Agreement; suitability of one thing to another; consistency.

The same which thereto is necessary, and of congruence appertaining. Martin on the Marr. of Priests, (1554.) x. ii.
Those virtues of whom I have spoken of good reason and congruence. Sir T. Elgot, Gov. fol. 190.

Divers translations, saith he, [St. Augustin,] have made many times the harder and darker sentences more plain and open; so that of congruence no offence can justly be taken for this new labour. Abp. Parker, Pref. to the Tr. of the Old Test.

O, now methinks a sullen, tragick scene
Would suit the time with pleasing congruence.

Marston, Antonio's Revenge.

CONGRUENCY.* n. s. [from congruence.] Agreement.

The philosophick cabbala and the text have a marvellous fit and easy congruency in this place.

More, Conj. Cabb. (1653,) p. 236.

CONGRUENT.† adj. [congruens, Lat.] Agreeing; correspondent.

For humble grammar first doth set the parts
Of congruent and well-according speech.

Sir J. Davies's Orchestra, (1598.)

The congruent and harmonious fitting of parts in a sentence hath almost the fastening and force of knitting and connexion.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

These planes were so separated as to move upon a common side of the congruent squares, as an axis. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CONGRUITY.† n. s. [from congrue.]

1. Suitableness; agreeableness.

Congruity of opinions to our natural constitution, is one great incentive to their reception. Glanville.

2. Fitness; pertinence.

A whole sentence may fail of its congruity by wanting one particle.

I must remember our ever-memorable Sir Philip Sidney, whose wit was in truth the very rule of congruity.

Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

3. Consequence of argument; reason; consistency.

With what congruity doth the church of Rome deny, that her enemies do at all appertain to the church of Christ? Hooker.

4. [In geometry.] Figures or lines which exactly correspond, when laid over one another, are in congruity.

5. [In theology.] Some of the schoolmen have devised a twofold merit: a merit of congruity, and a merit of condignity. The latter they ascribe to works which a man does by the assistance of grace, and to which a reward is in justice due. The former they ascribe to such works as a man does by the mere strength of freewill, and which are to be rewarded only out of liberality. But what foundation is there for this sort of merit, since all of us are by nature evil? Welchman on the 39 Articles, Art. xiii. See also CONDIGNITY.

CONGRUMENT.† n. s. [from congrue.] Fitness; adaptation. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says; and, I may add, perhaps never was in use. Dr. Johnson, however, cites as an example the passage from B. Jonson, which I have given under congruent; where congrument, in some editions of the poet, seems to be an error of the press; and it is rightly given congruent in the Rev. Mr. Whalley's edition of the poet's works.

CONGRUOUS.† adj. [congruus, Lat.]

1. Agreeable to; consistent with.

They also perform actions of life and motion, congruous and convenient unto their nature and kind,

Moutagu, App. to Cas. (1625.) p. 232.

The existence of God is so many ways manifest, and the obedience we owe him so congruous to the light of reason, that a great part of mankind give testimony to the law of nature.

Locke.

2. Suitable to; accommodated to; proportionate or commensurate.

It had been more congruous to have continued the same manner of expression. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 114.

The faculty is infinite, the object infinite, and they infinitely congruous to one another. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

3. Rational; fit.

Therefore was it very singularly congruous, that from this place, from whence the sealing men took their notice by a light to escape the hazard of those ways they knew not, it should please God also, by the lantern of his word, to give aim to the people that sate in darkness.

Gregory's Posthumus, (1650,) p. 3.

Motives that address themselves to our reason, are fittest to be employed upon reasonable creatures: it is no ways congruous, that God should be always frightening us; into an acknowledgement of the truth. Atterbury.

CONGRUOUSLY.† adv. [from congruous.] Suitably; pertinently; consistently.

There they must of necessity, if they will speak congruously, by the first Christian era, mean the first hundred years after Christ, or that, and some of the next centuries following.

Bp. Barlow's Rem. p. 114.

Nothing can sound more congruously or harmoniously.

More, Expos. Seven Churches, p. 64.

I could wish that in their speech and compliment they

French, regard not use the Latin tongue, or else speak it more conjecture specie Heulin's Voyage of France, p. 296.
 This specie is to be regarded, because, congruently unto it, one specie warmed the bladder, found it then lighter than the specie weight. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

CONICAL, adj. [conicus, Lat.] Having the form of a cone, or round decreasing.

conical forms arise, pointed spear divide the skies. Prior.
 apt of a conical figure: the basis is oblong.

conical vessels, with their bases towards the heart;
 pass on, their diameters grow still less. Arbuthnot.

CONICALLY, adv. [from conical.] In form of a cone.
 a sugar loaf, filled
 no liquor falls through the holes at the bottom, being conical.

CONIC, n. s. A curve line arising from the a cone by a plane.

CONIC, n. s. That part of geometry which considers the cone, and the properties arising from its sections.

the third proposition of the first book of the Apollonius, and from similar triangles.
Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 22.

TO CONJECT, v. n. [conjectum, Lat.] To guess;
 to conjecture. Not in use.

I treat you then,
 that but imperfectly conject,
 would not build yourself a trouble. Shakspeare.

TO CONJECTURE, v. a. [Lat. conjicio, conjectum.] To conjecture; to throw.

the colonies—congested and conjected at a mass
 the church of England.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. (1625), p. 298.

CONJECTURER, n. s. [from conject.] A guesser; a conjecturer.

And because he pretends to be a great conjector at other by their writings, I will not fail to give ye, readers, a taste of him from his title.
Milton, Apology for Smectym.

For conjectors would obtrude, thy painted skin conclude. Swift.

CONJECTURABLE, adj. [from conjecture.] Being the object of conjecture; possible to be guessed.

CONJECTURAL, adj. [old Fr. conjectural.] Depending on conjecture; said or done by guess.

They lit by the fire, and presume to know
 Whate'ers, and who declines, side factions, and give opt Conjectural marriages. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Thou speak'st it falsely, as I love mine honour,
 An conjectural tears to come into me. Shakspeare.

A matter of great profit, save that I doubt it is too to venture upon, if one could discern what corn, are likely to be in plenty or scarcity. Bacon.

But words are not in Callinachus, and consequently the only conjectural. Brown.

CONJECTURALLY, n. s. [from conjectural.] That which depends upon guess.

They conjecturally not recurred unto chronology, or the records of the past, when themselves unto probabilities, and the conjecture of philosophy. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONJECTURALLY, adv. [from conjectural.] By guess;
 by conjecture.

What may be at any time out of Scripture, but probably conjecturally surmised. Hooker.
 probably, not conjecturally proved. Maine.

CONJECTURE, n. s. [conjectura, Latin. "On appellatione presumption chez les jurisconsultes, ce qui dit pour verité par provision, en cas que le contraire ne se prouve point, et il dit plus que con- jecture, quoique la Dictionnaire de l'Academie n'en ait point épluché la difference." Leibnitz, Ess. sur la Theod. p. 28.]

1. Guess; imperfect knowledge; preponderation of opinion without proof.

In the casting of lots a man cannot, upon any ground of reason, bring the event so much as under conjecture. South.

2. Idea; notion; conception. Not now in use.

Now entertain conjecture of a time,
 When creeping murmur, and the poring dark,
 Fills the wide vessel of the universe. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

TO CONJECTURE, v. a. [from the noun.] To guess; to judge by guess; to entertain an opinion upon bare probability.

When we look upon such things as equally may or may not be, human reason can then, at the best, but conjecture what will be. South.

CONJECTURER, n. s. [from conjecture.] A guesser;
 one who forms opinion without proof.

If we should believe very grave conjecturers, carnivorous animals now were not flesh devourers then. Brown.

I shall leave conjecturers to their own imaginations. Addison.

CONIFEROUS, adj. [conifere, old Fr. conus and fere,
 Lat.]

Such trees or herbs are coniferous as bear a squamose, scaly fruit, of a woody substance, and a figure approaching to a cone, in which are many seeds; and when they are ripe, the several cells in the cone open and the seeds drop out. Of this kind, are the fir, pine, and beech. Quincy.

The laurel, in its prosperity, abounds with pleasant flowers;
 whereas those of the cedar are very little, and scarce perceptible, answerable to the fir, pine, and other coniferous trees.

Sir T. Brown, Misc. Tracts, p. 68.

TO CONJOBBLE, v. a. [from con, together, and jobber- no, the head.] To concert; to settle; to discuss.
 A low cant word.

What would a body think of a minister that should conjob- ble matters of state with tumblers, and confer politicks with tinkers? L'Estrange.

TO CONJOIN, v. a. [conjoindre, Fr. conjungo, Lat.]

1. To unite; to consolidate into one.

Whose marriages conjoin the white rose and the red.
Dryd. Polyolb. S. 5.

Thou wrong'st Pirithous, and not him alone;
 But, while I live, two friends conjoin'd in one. Dryden.

2. To unite in marriage.

If either of you know any inward impediment,
 Why you should not be conjoin'd, I charge
 You on your souls to utter it. Shakspeare, Much ado.

3. To associate; to connect.

Common and universal spirits convey the action of the remedy into the part, and conjoin the virtue of bodies far disjoined. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The foresaid knight was conjoined, for the nearness of his place, on the prince's affairs.

Wotton, Life of the D. of Buckingham.

Men of differing interests can be reconciled in one communion, at least, the designs of all can be conjoined in ligatures of the same reverence, and piety, and devotion. Bp. Taylor.

Let that which he learns next be nearly conjoined with what he knows already. Locke.

TO CONJOIN, v. n. To league; to unite.

This part of his
Conjoins with my disease, and helps to end me. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

CONJOINT, adj. [conjoint, Fr.] United; connected; associated.

 immediately follow each other in the order of the scale; as, ut and re. Dict.

CONJOINTLY. adv. [from conjoint.] In union; together; in association; jointly; not apart.

A gross and frequent error, commonly committed in the use of doubtful remedies, conjointly with those that are of approved virtues. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The parts of the body separately, make known the passions of the soul, or else conjointly one with the other. Dryden.

CO'NISOR. See COGNISOR.

CONJUGAL. adj. [conjugal, Lat.] Matrimonial; belonging to marriage; connubial.

Their conjugal affection still is ty'd,
And still the mournful race is multiply'd. Dryden, Fab.

I could not forbear commending the young woman for her conjugal affection, when I found that she had left the good man at home. Spectator.

He mark'd the conjugal dispute;
Nell roar'd incessant, Dick sat mute. Swift.

CONJUGALLY. adv. [from conjugal.] Matrimonially; connubially.

This mighty champion challenges me with great insultation — to name but one bishop or priest of note, which after holy orders conversed conjugally with his wife, without the scandal of the church: — I do here accept his offer.

Bp. Hall, Hom. of the Marr. Cergy. p. 186.
Such a hater loses by due punishment that privilege, Deut. xxiv. 1. to divorce for a natural dislike; which, though it could not love conjugally, yet sent away civilly, and with just conditions. Milton, Colast.

TO CONJUGATE. v. a. [conjugo, Latin.]

1. To join; to join in marriage; to unite.

Those drawing as well marriage as wardship, gave him both power and occasion to conjugate at pleasure the Norman and the Saxon houses. Wotton, Char. of Kings of Eng.

2. To inflect verbs; to decline verbs through their various terminations.

There are some verbs, which, although perhaps anciently conjugated in the manner of those belonging to the fourth conjugation; yet are now become obsolete in that way of inflection, and may therefore be ranked among those of the third conjugation. White on the English Verb, p. 45.

CO'NJUGATE. n. s. [conjugatus, Latin.] Agreeing in derivation with another word, and therefore generally resembling in signification.

His grammatical argument, grounded upon the derivation of spontaneous from sponte, weighs nothing: we have learned in logic, that conjugates are sometimes in name only, and not in deed. Bp. Bramhall, Anst. to Hobbes.

CO'NJUGATE Diameter, or Axis. [In geometry.] A right line, bisecting the transverse diameter.

Chambers.

CONJUGATION. n. s. [conjugatio, Lat.]

1. A couple; a pair.

The heart is so far from affording nerves unto other parts, that it receiveth very few itself from the sixth conjugation or pair of nerves. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. The act of uniting or compiling things together.

The general and indefinite contemplations and notions of the elements, and their conjugations, are to be set aside, being but notional, and illimited and definite axioms are to be drawn out of measured instances. Bacon.

All the various mixtures and conjugations of atoms do beget nothing. Bentley, Sermon.

3. The form of inflecting verbs through their series of terminations.

Have those who have writ so much about declensions and conjugations, about concords and syntaxes, lost their labour, and been learned to no purpose? Locke.

4. Union; assemblage.

The supper of the Lord is the most sacred, mysterious, and useful conjugation of secret and holy things and duties. Bp. Taylor.

CONJUNCT. adj. [conjunctus, Lat.] Conjoined; concurrent; united. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the example from Shakspeare.

It pleas'd the king his master to strike at me,
When he, conjunct and flattering his displeasure,
Tript me behind. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The Lord himself being conjunct with the angels, whom he employed in this embassy. Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xviii. 10.

There was a very conjunct friendship between the two brothers and him. Aubrey, Anec. of Sir W. Raleigh, ii. 511.

CONJUNCTION. n. s. [conjunctio, Lat.]

1. Union; association; league.

With our small conjunction, we should on,
To see how fortune is dispos'd to us. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He will unite the white rose and the red;

Smile, heaven, upon his fair conjunction,
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The treaty gave abroad a reputation of a strict conjunction and amity between them. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Man can effect no great matter by his personal strength, but as he acts in society and conjunction with others. South.

An invisible hand from heaven mingles hearts and souls by strange, secret, and unaccountable conjunctions. South.

2. The congress of two planets in the same degree of the zodiack, where they are supposed to have great power and influence.

God, neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the stars, should bury them under a second flood. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Has not a poet more virtues and vices within his circle? Cannot he observe their influences in their oppositions and conjunctions, in their altitudes and depressions? He shall sooner find ink than nature exhausted. Rymer, Trag. of last Age.

Pompey and Caesar were two stars of such a magnitude, that their conjunction was as fatal as their opposition. Swift.

3. A word made use of to connect the clauses of a period together, and to signify their relation to one another. Clarke.

CONJUNCTIVE. adj. [conjunctivus, Lat.]

1. Closely united. A sense not in use, Dr. Johnson says. He overlooked, however, Thomson.

Taught by Thee,

Ours are the plans of policy and peace,
To live like brothers, and conjunctive all
Embellish life. Thomson, Sum. ver. 1775.

She's so conjunctive to my life and soul,
That as the star moves, not but in his sphere,
I could not but by her. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

2. [In grammar.] The mood of a verb, used subsequently to a conjunction. Dr. Johnson so styles the subjunctive mood in his Grammar of the English Language.

3. Connecting together, as a conjunction.

Though all conjunctions conjoin sentences, yet, with respect to the sense, some are conjunctive, and some disjunctive.

Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

4. United; not apart. Of this sense, as of the preceding, Dr. Johnson has taken no notice. But of the present his own writings afford an example.

Finding King James irremediably excluded, he voted for the conjunctive sovereignty, upon this principle, that he thought the title of the prince and his consort equal.

Johnson, Life of Sheffield Duke of Bucks.

CONJUNCTIVELY. adv. [from conjunctive.] In union; not apart.

These are good mediums conjunctively taken; that is, not one without the other. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Of Strasburg and Ulm I may speak conjunctively, being of one nature; both free, and both jealous of their freedom.

Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

CONJUNCTIVENESS. n. s. [from conjunctive.] The quality of joining or uniting.

CONJUNCTLY. adv. [from conjunct.] Jointly; together; not apart.

CONJUNCTURE. n. s. [conjectura, Fr.]

1. Combination of many circumstances, or causes.

I never met with a more unhappy conjunction of affairs than in the business of that earl. K. Charles.

Every virtue requires time and place, a proper object, and a fit conjunction of circumstances. Addison, Spect.

2. Occasion; critical time.

Such censures always attend such conjunctions, and find fault for what is not done, as with that which is done. Clarendon.

3. Mode of union; connection.

He is quick to perceive the motions of articulation, and conjunctions of letters in words. Holler, Elem. of Speech.

4. Consistency.

I was willing to grant to presbytery what with reason it can pretend to, in a conjunction with episcopacy. K. Charles.

CONJURATION.† n. s. [from conjure.]

1. The form or act of summoning another in some sacred name.

We charge you, in the name of God, take heed:
Under this conjunction speak, my lord. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

2. A magical form of words; an incantation, an enchantment.

Your conjunction, fair knight, is too strong for my poor spirit to disobey. Sidney.

What drugs, what charms,
What conjunction, and what mighty magick,
For such proceeding I am charg'd withal,
I won his daughter with? Shakespeare, Othello.

3. A plot; a conspiracy.

And because this information might be made more clear, he did make many instances unto the said ambassadors, that they would give him the authors of the said conjunction, this being the sole means whereby their own honour might be preserved. Sir W. Ashton, (1624,) Sup. to Cubala, p. 153.

4. Earnest entreaty. Not now in use.

Ger. But my father's charge.
Win. My conjunction shall dispense with that;
You may be up as early as you please,
But hence to-night you shall not. Heywood's English Traveller.

To CONJURE.† v. a. [conjurō, Latin.]

1. To summon in a sacred name; to enjoin with the highest solemnity.

O, prince, I conjure thee, as thou believ'st
There is another comfort than this world. Shakespeare, Meas. for Meas.

He concluded with sighs and tears to conjure them, that they would no more press him to consent to a thing so contrary to his reason. Clarendon.

The church may address her sons in the form St. Paul does the Philippians, when he conjures them to unity. Decay of Piety.

I conjure you! let him know,
Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it. Addison, Cato.

2. To bind many by an oath to some common design.

This sense is rare
[He] in proud rebellious arms
Drew after him the third part of heaven's sons,

3. To influence by magick; to affect by enchantment; to charm.

What black magician conjures up this fiend,
To stop devoted charitable deeds? Shakespeare, Rich. III.

What is he whose griefs
Bear such an emphasis? whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wand'ring stars, and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded hearers? Shakespeare, Hamlet.

I thought their own fears, whose black arts first raised up those turbulent spirits, would force them to conjure them down again. King Charles.

You have conjured up persons that exist no where else but on old coins, and have made our passions and virtues visible. Addison on Ancient Medals.

be observed, that when this word is used
mon. or conspire, its accent is on the last syllable, conjure; when for charm, on the first, conjure. This is Dr. Johnson's observation. But, that this has not always been observed, may be perceived in the example which I have given from Shakespeare under the first definition; where, though certainly improperly, the accent is on the first syllable.

To CONJURE. v. n. To practise charms or enchantments; to enchant.

My invocation is honest and fair; and in his mistress's name I conjure only but to raise up him. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

Out of my door, you witch! you hag, you baggage, you pouleat, you runaway! Out, out, out; I'll conjure you, I'll fortunetell you. Shakespeare, Mer. W. of Windsor.

To CONJURE.* v. n. To enter into conspiracy.

When those 'gainst states and kingdoms do conjure,
Who then can think their headlong ruin to recure. Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 26.

CONJURER. n. s. [from conjure.]

1. An enchanter; one that uses charms.

Good Doctor Pinch, you are a conjuror;
Establish him in his true sense again. Shakespeare, Com. of Errors.

Figures in the book
Of some dread conjuror, that would enforce nature. Donne.
Thus has he done you British consorts right,
Whose husbands, should they pry like mine to-night,
Would never find you in your conduct slipping,
Though they turn'd conjurers to take you tripping. Addison.

2. An impostor who pretends to secret arts; a cunning man.

From the account the loser brings,
The conjuror knows who stole the things. Prior.

3. By way of irony; a man of shrewd conjecture; a man of sagacity.

Though ants are very knowing, I don't take them to be conjurers; and therefore they could not guess that I had put some corn in that room. Addison.

CONJUREMENT. n. s. [from conjure.] Serious injunction; solemn demand.

I should not be induced but by your earnest intreaties and serious conjurements. Milton, on Education.

CONNASCENCE. n. s. [con and nascor, Lat.]

1. Common birth; production at the same time; community of birth.

2. Being produced together with another being.
Christians have baptized these geminous births and double connascencies, as containing in them a distinction of soul. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. The act of uniting or growing together: improperly.

Symphysis denotes a connascence, or growing together. Wiseman, Surgery.

CONNATE. adj. [from con and natus, Latin.] Born with another; being of the same birth.

Many, who deny all connate notions in the speculative intellect, do yet admit them in this. South.
Their dispositions to be reflected some at a greater, and others at a less thickness, of thin plates or bubbles, are connate with the rays, and immutable. Newton, Opt.

CONNATURAL. adj. [con and natural.]

1. United with the being; connected by nature.

First, in man's mind we find an appetite
To learn and know the truth of ev'ry thing,
Which is connatural, and born with it. Davies.

These affections are connatural to us, and as we grow up so do they. L'Estrange.

2. Participant of the same nature.

Is there no way, besides
These painful passages, how we may come
To death, and mix with our connatural dust? Milton, P. L.

Whatever draws me on,
Or sympathy, or some connat'ral force,
Pow'ful at greatest distance to unite,
With secret amity.

Milton, P. L.

CONNATURALITY. n. s. [from connaturalis] Participation of the same nature; natural inseparability.

There is a connaturality and congruity between that knowledge and those habits, and that future estate of the soul.

Hale.

TO CONNATURALIZE.* v. a. [from con and naturalize.] To connect by nature; to make natural.

How often have you been forced to swallow sickness, to drink dead palsies and foaming epilepsies, to render your intemperances familiar to you, — before ever you could connaturalize your midnight revels to your temper!

Scott, Christ. Life, l. iv.

CONNATURALLY. adv. [from connaturalis.] In co-existence with nature; originally.

Some common notions seem connaturally engraven in the soul, antecedently to discursive ratiocination.

Hale.

CONNATURALNESS. n. s. [from connaturalis.] Participation of the same nature; natural union.

Such is the connaturalness of our corruptions, except we looked for an account hereafter.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. vii.

TO CONNECT. v. a. [connecto, Lat.]

1. To join; to link; to unite; to conjoin; to fasten together.

The corpuscles that constitute the quicksilver, will be so connected to one another, that, instead of a fluid body, they will appear in the form of a red powder.

Boyle.

2. To unite by intervention; as a cement.

The natural order of the connecting ideas must direct the syllogisms, and a man must see the connection of each intermediate idea with those that it connects, before he can use it in a syllogism.

Locke.

3. To join in a just series of thought, or regular construction of language: as, the authour connects his reasons well.

TO CONNE'CT. v. n. To cohere; to have just relation to things precedent and subsequent. This is seldom used but in conversation.

CONNE'CTIVE.* adj. [from connect.] Having the power of joining or connecting together.

There are times, when prepositions totally lose their connective nature, being converted into adverbs, and used in syntax accordingly.

Harris, Hermes, ii. 3.

CONNE'CTIVE.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A conjunction.

Connectives, according as they connect either sentences or words, are called by the different names of conjunctions or prepositions.

Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

CONNE'CTIVELY. adv. [from connect.] In conjunction; in union; jointly; conjointly; conjunctly.

The people's power is great and indisputable, whenever they can unite connectively, or by deputation, to exert it.

Swift.

TO CONNE'X. v. a. [connexum, Lat.] To join or link together; to fasten to each other.

Those birds who are taught some words or sentences, cannot conner their words or sentences in coherence with the matter which they signify.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

They fly,
By chains conner'd, and with destructive sweep
Rehead whole troops at once.

Philips.

CONNE'XION. n. s. [from connex, or connexio, Lat.]

1. Union; junction; the act of fastening together; the state of being fastened together.

My heart, which, by a secret harmony,
Still moves with thine, join'd in conne'xion sweet.

Milton, P. L.

There must be a future state, where the eternal and inseparable conne'xion between virtue and happiness shall be manifested.

Atterbury.

2. Just relation to some thing precedent or subsequent; consequence of argumentation; coherence.

Contemplation of human nature doth, by a necessary conne'xion and chain of causes, carry us up to the Deity.

Hale.

Each intermediate idea must be such as, in the whole chain, hath a visible conne'xion with those two it is placed between.

Locke.

A conscious, wise, reflecting cause,
That can deliberate, means elect, and find
Their due conne'xion with the end design'd.

Blackmore's Creation.

CONNE'XIVE. adj. [from connex.] Having the force of connexion; conjunctive.

The predicate and subject are joined in a form of words by conne'xive particles.

Watts, Logic.

CONNE'XTION. n. s. [from connicito, Lat.] A winking.

Dict.

CONNIVANCE.* n. s. [from connive.] This word is often written, and particularly in our old lexicography, connivence; but Dr. Johnson has chosen connivance. The old Fr. connivence, and Ital. connivenza, countenance the former. See also CONNIVENCY.

1. The act of winking. Not in use.

2. Voluntary blindness; pretended ignorance; forbearance.

It is better to mitigate usury by declaration, than to suffer it to rage by connivance.

Bacon, Ess. 42.

Disobedience, having gained one degree of liberty, will demand another: every vice interprets a connivance an approbation.

South.

A connivance to admit half, will produce ruin.

Swift.

TO CONNIVE.* v. n. [connivco, Lat.; conniver, old French. But Cotgrave, who notices our substantive, does not render the French verb by our English one. The earliest example of this verb, which Dr. Johnson cites, is from the Decay of Christian Piety, which was published in 1667. Milton's is only coeval authority: yet ought to be admitted. But Beaumont and Fletcher, of older authority, are the earliest users of the word which I have hitherto met with.]

1. To wink.

This artist is to teach them how to nod judiciously, to connive with either eye.

Spectator, No.

2. To pretend blindness or ignorance; to forbear; to pass uncensured.

I have conniv'd at this, your friend and you,

But what is got by this connivency.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Martial Maid.

I suffer them to enter and possess

A place so heavenly; and, conniving, seem

To gratify my scornful enemies.

Milton, P. L. x. 624.

The licentiousness of inferiours, and the remissness of superiours, the one violates, and the other connives.

Decay of Piety.

With whatever colours he persuades authority to connive at his own vices, he will desire its protection from the effects of other men's.

Rogers.

He thinks it a scandal to government to connive at such traits, as reject all revelation.

Swift.

CONNIVENCY.* n. s. [Ital. connivenza, old Fr. connivence. This was the more usual word with our ancestors for connivence.] Pretended ignorance; forbearance.

She did not ransack their consciences by any severe inquisition, but rather secured them by a gracious connivency.

Bacon, Collect. of Q. Elizabeth.

Yourself, and many others, have been driven, of late, to excuse and countenance your execrable ingratitude with a false and scandalous report of some further hope and comfort yielded to the Catholics for toleration or connivency, before his [K. James I.] coming to the crown, than since hath been performed. Id. Northampton, Proc. ag. Garnet, M. 2.

By connivency and silence, they in a manner partake in their sins. Hales, Rem. p. 134.

CONNI'VENT.* adj. [from connive.] Dormant; not attentive.

His legal justice cannot be so fickle and so variable, sometimes like a devouring fire, and by and by connivent in the embers; or, if I may so say, oscitant and supine.

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce, ii. 3.

CONNI'VER.* n. s. [from connive.] One who pretends blindness; who passes wickedness uncensured.

All sins which we give allowance to, being committed, or not hindered by us if we may, are ours, as if we committed them; first, commanders; abettors; counsellors; consenters; commenders; connivers; concealers; not-hinderers; each of these will be found guilty before God's tribunal.

Junius, Sin. Stigm. (1639.) p. 825.

CONNOISSEUR.† n. s. [French.] A judge; a critick. It is often used of a pretended critick, Dr. Johnson says.

Your lesson learnt, you'll be secure

To get the name of connoisseur.

Swift.

He has been at a considerable expence in the improvement of it, [his villa,] in which he has shew'd himself to be master of a very polite and genteel taste. You are a sort of connoisseur this way; you will have an opportunity of passing your own judgement upon it.

Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 1.

CONNOISSEURSHIP.* n. s. [connoisseur.] The skill of a connoisseur.

To CONNOTATE. v. a. [con and nota, Lat.] To designate something besides itself; to imply; to infer.

God's foreseeing doth not include or connotate predetermining, any more than I decree with my intellect. Hammond.

CONNOTATION. n. s. [from connotate.] Implication of something besides itself; inference; illation.

By reason of the co-existence of one thing with another, there ariseth a various relation or connotation between them.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Plato by his ideas means only the divine essence with this connotation, as it is variously imitable or participable by created beings.

Norris.

To CONNOTE. v. a. [con and nota, Lat.] To imply; to betoken; to include.

Good, in the general notion of it, connotes also a certain suitableness of it to some other thing.

South.

CONNU'BIAL. adj. [connubialis, Lat.] Matrimonial; nuptial; pertaining to marriage; conjugal.

Should second love a pleasing flame inspire,
And the chaste queen connubial rites require. Pope, Odyssey.

CONNUMERATION.* n. s. [con and numeration.] A reckoning together.

How could he otherwise have missed the opportunity of insisting upon the connumeration of the three persons, the assertion of their joint testimony and of their unity?

Porson to Travis, p. 225.

CO'NNY.* adj. [much the same as cenny.] Brave; fine. North.

Grose.

CO'NOID. n. s. [κωνοειδής.] A figure partaking of a cone; approaching to the form of a cone.

The tympanum is not capable of tension as a drum: there remains another way, by drawing it to the centre into a conoid form.

Holder, Elem. of Speech.

CONO'IDICAL. adj. [from conoid.] Approaching to a conick form, to the form of a round decreasing.

To CONQUASSATE. v. a. [conquasso, Lat.] To shake; to agitate. Not in use.

Vomits do violently conquassate the lungs.

Harvey.

CONQUASSATION. n. s. [from conquassate.] Agitation; concussion.

To CONQUER. v. a. [conquerir, Fr. conquiere, Latin.]

1. To gain by conquest; to over-run; to win.
They had conquer'd them, and brought them under tribute.

1 Mac. viii. 2.

Welcome, great Stagirite, and teach me now

All I was born to know,

Thy scholar's victories thou dost outdo:

He conquer'd th' earth, the whole world you.

Cowley.

'Twas fit,

Who conquer'd nature, should preside o'er wit.

Pope.

We conquer'd France, but felt our captive's charms,

Their arts victorious triumph'd o'er our arms.

Pope.

2. To overcome; to subdue; to vanquish.

Both tugging to be victors, breast to breast;

Yet neither conqueror, nor conquer'd. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

The conquer'd also, and enslav'd by war,

Shall, with their freemen lost, all virtue lose,

And fear of God.

Milton, P. L.

Anna conquers but to save,

And governs but to bless.

Smith.

3. To surmount; to overcome: as, he conquered his reluctance.

To CONQUER. v. n. To get the victory; to overcome.

Put him to choler straight: he hath been used

Ever to conquer and to have his word

Off contradiction.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

Equal success had set these champions high,

And both resolv'd to conquer, or to die.

Waller.

The logick of a conquering sword has no propriety.

Decay of Piety.

CONQUERABLE.† adj. [old Fr. conquerable.] Possible to be overcome.

While the heap is small, and the particulars few, he will find it easy and conquerable.

South.

CONQUERESS.* n. s. [from conquer.] She who conquers.

Your beauty of itself is conqueress.

Phaenix's Nest, (1593.) p. 39.

The conqueress departs, and with her led

These prisoners.

Fairfax, Tass. v. 79.

Oh, Truth, thou art a mighty conqueress.

Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

CONQUEROR.† n. s. [old Fr. conquereur.]

1. A man that has obtained a victory; a victor.

Bound with triumphant garlands will I come,

And lead thy daughter to a conqueror's bed.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The gain of civil wars will not allow

Bags for the conqueror's crew.

Cowley.

A critick that attacks authors in reputation, is as the slave who called out to the conqueror, Remember, Sir, that you are a man.

Addison, Guardian.

2. One that subdues and ruins countries.

Deserving freedom more

Than those their conquerors, who leave behind

Nothing but ruin wheresoe'er they rove.

Milton, P. R.

That tyrant god, that restless conqueror,

May quit his pleasure, to assert his pow'r.

Prior.

CONQUEST.† n. s. [conqueste, French; conquest, Sax. Spenser, for the sake of the rhyme, gives an instance of the accent on the second syllable of this word, Colin Clout, ver. 950.]

1. The act of conquering; subjection.

A perfect conquest of a country reduces all the people to the condition of subjects.

Davies on Ireland.

2. Acquisition by victory; thing gained.

More willingly I mention air,

This our old conquest; than remember hell,

Our hated habitation.

Milton, P. R.

3. Victory; success in arms.

I must yield my body to the earth,
And by my fall, the conquest to my foe. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.
I'll lead thy daughter to a conqueror's bed;
To whom I will retail my conquest won,
And she shall be sole victress. Shakspeare, Rich. III.
Not to be overcome, was to do more
Than all the conquests former kings did gain. Dryden.
In joys of conquest he resigns his breath,
And, fill'd with England's glory, smiles in death. Addison.

4. In feudal law, purchase. [low Lat. conquestus.]
What we call purchase, the feudists call conquest; both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance. Blackstone.

CONSANGUINEOUS. adj. [consanguineus, Lat.]
Near of kin; of the same blood; related by birth, not affined.

Am I not consanguineous? Am I not of her blood?
Shakspeare.

CONSANGUINITY. n. s. [consanguinitas, Latin.] Relation by blood; relation by descent from one common progenitor. Nearness of kin. • Distinguished from affinity, or relation by marriage.

I've forgot my father;
I know no touch of consanguinity.

Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.
There is the supreme and indissoluble consanguinity and society between men in general; of which the heathen poet, whom the apostle calls to witness, saith, We are all his generation. Bacon, Holy War.

The first original would subsist, though he outlived all terms of consanguinity, and became a stranger unto his progeny.

Christ has condescended to a cognation and consanguinity with us. Brown, Vulg. Err. South.

CONSARCINATION. n. s. [from consarcino, Latin, to piece.] The act of patching together. Dict.

CONSCIENCE.† n. s. [conscience, Fr. conscientia,
Lat. "Conscience is a Latin word, though with an English termination; and, according to the very notation of it, imports a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action: and so is properly the application of a general law to a particular instance of practice. South, Sermon. vol. ii. p. 438.]

1. The knowledge or faculty by which we judge of the goodness or wickedness of ourselves.

When a people have no touch of conscience, no sense of their evil doings, it is bootless to think to restrain them. Spenser.

Who against faith, and conscience, can be heard Infallible? Milton, P. L.

Conscience has not been wanting to itself, in endeavouring to get the clearest information about the will of God. South.

But why must those be thought to 'scape, that feel
Those rods of scorpions, and those whips of steel,
Which conscience shakes? Creech, Juv.

No courts created yet, nor cause was heard;
But all was safe, for conscience was their guard. Dryden, Ovid.

Conscience signifies that knowledge which a man hath of his own thoughts and actions; and, because if a man judgeth fairly of his actions, by comparing them with the law of God, his mind will approve or condemn him, this knowledge or conscience may be both an accuser and a judge. Swift.

2. Justice; the estimate of conscience; the determination of conscience; honesty. This is sometimes a serious and sometimes a ludicrous sense.

This is thank-worthy, if a man, for conscience toward God, endure grief. 1 Pet. ii. 19.

Now is Cupid a child of conscience; he makes restitution.
Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

He had, against right and conscience, by shameful treachery, intruded himself into another man's kingdom. Knolles.

What you require cannot, in conscience, be deferred beyond this time. Milton.

Her majesty is obliged in conscience to endeavour this by her authority, as much as by her practice. Swift.

3. Copsciousness; knowledge of our own thoughts or actions.

Merit, and good works, is the end of man's motion; and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man's rest.

The reason why the simple sort are moved with authority, is the conscience of their own ignorance. Bacon.

The sweetest cordial we receive at last,
Is conscience of our virtuous actions past. Hooker.

Hector was in an absolute certainty of death, and depressed with the conscience of being in an ill cause. Denham.

4. Real sentiment; veracity; private thoughts.

Do'st thou in conscience think, tell me, Æmilia,
That there be women do abuse their husbands,
In such gross kind? Shakspeare, Othello.

They did in their consciences know, that he was not able to send them any part of it. Clarendon.

5. Scruple; principle of action.

We must make a conscience in keeping the just laws of superiours. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

Why should not the one make as much conscience of betraying for gold, as the other of doing it for a crust.

Children are travellers newly arrived in a strange country;
we should therefore make conscience not to mislead them.

6. In ludicrous language, reason; reasonableness.

Why do'st thou weep? Can'st thou the conscience lack,
To think I shall lack friends? Shakspeare, Timon.

Half a dozen fools are, in all conscience, as many as you should require. Swift.

7. Knowledge of the actions of others. This sense is rare.

How might I appear at this altar, except with those affections that no less love the light and witness, than they have the conscience of your virtue?

B. Jonson, Ded. to Lady Wroth of his Alchemist.

CO'NSCIENCED.* adj. [from conscience.] Having conscience.

Nothing will hold a sanctified, tender-conscienced rebel, but a prison, or a halter. South, Sermon. v. 221.

CO'NSCIENT.* adj. [Lat. consciens.] Conscious. See the second sense of CONSCIENTIOUS.

As if he were conscient to himself, that he had played his part well-upon the stage. Bacon on Learning.

CONSCIENTIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. conscientieux.]

1. Scrupulous; exactly just; regulated by conscience.

Lead a life in so conscientious a probity, as in thought, word and deed to make good the character of an honest man.

L'Estrange.

2. Conscious.

Among such as would persuade the world, religion were too pure to mix with the gentility of learning, the heretick, guilty and conscientious to himself of refutability, taketh place first. Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 141.

CONSCIENTIOUSLY. adv. [from conscientious.] According to the direction of conscience.

More stress has been laid upon the strictness of law, than conscientiously did belong to it. L'Estrange.

There is the erroneous as well as the rightly informed conscience; and if the conscience happens to be deluded, sin does not therefore cease to be sin, because a man committed it conscientiously. South.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS. n. s. [from conscientious.] Exactness of justice; tenderness of conscience.

It will be a wonderful conscientiousness in them, if they will content themselves with less profit than they can make.

Locke.

CO'NSCIONABLE.† adj. [from conscience.] Reasonable; just; according to conscience.

A knave, very voluble; no farther conscionable than in putting on the meer form of civil and humane seeming.

Shakspeare.

Let my debtors have conscionable satisfaction. Wotton.
These things be comely and pleasant to see, and worthy of honour from the beholder: a young saint, an old martyr, a religious soldier, a conscionable statesman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a silent woman, &c.

Bp. Hall, Holy Observations.

CO'NSCION, adv. [from conscionable.] Equity; reasonable. Dict.

CO'NSCION, adv. [from conscionable.] In a manner agreeable to conscience; reasonably; justly.
A prince may be used conscionably as well as a common person. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

CO'NSCIOUS, adj. [consciens, Lat.]

1. Endowed with the power of knowing one's own thoughts and actions.

Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence. Bentley, Serm.

Among substances some are thinking or conscious beings, or have a power of thought. Watts, Logic.

2. Knowing from memory; having the knowledge of any thing without any new information.

The damsel then to Tancred sent,
Who conscious of th' occasion, separ'd th' event. Dryden.

3. Admitted to the knowledge of any thing: with to.

The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine,
Æneas only conscious to the sign,
Presag'd th' event. Dryden, Æn.

Roses or honey cannot be thought to smell or taste their own sweetness, or an organ be conscious to its music, or gunpowder to its flashing or noise. Bentley, Serm.

4. Bearing witness by the dictate of conscience to any thing.

The queen had been solicitous with the king on his behalf, being conscious to herself that he had been encouraged by her. Clarendon.

CO'NSCIOUSLY, adv. [from consciens.] With knowledge of one's own actions.

If these perceptions, with their consciousness, always remained in the mind, the same thinking thing would be always consciously present. Locke.

CO'NSCIOUSNESS, n. s. [from consciens.]

1. The perception of what passes in a man's own mind. Locke.

If spirit be without thinking, I have no idea of any thing left; therefore consciousness must be its essential attribute. Watts, Logic.

2. Internal sense of guilt, or innocence.

No man doubts of a Supreme Being, until, from the consciousness of his provocations, it become his interest there should be none. Government of the Tongue.

Such ideas, no doubt, they would have had, had not their consciousness to themselves, of their ignorance of them, kept them from so idle an attempt. Locke.

An honest mind is not in the power of a dishonest: to break its peace, there must be some guilt or consciousness. Pope.

CONSCRIPT, † adj. [from conscribo, Lat.] A term used in speaking of the Roman senators, who were called Patres conscripti, from their names being written in the register of the senate.

Of strength again returning with my hair. Milton, S. A.

A bishop ought not to consecrate a church which the patron has built for filthy gain, and not for true devotion. Ayliffe.

2. To dedicate inviolably to some particular purpose, or person: with to.

He shall consecrate unto the Lord the days of his separation, and shall bring a lamb of the first year for a trespass offering. Numb. vi. 12.

3. To canonize.

CO'NSECRATE, adj. [from the verb.] Consecrated; sacred; devoted; devote; dedicated.

Shouldst thou but hear I were licentious;

And that this body, consecrate to thee,

By ruffian lust should be contaminate.

Shakespeare, Com. of Err.

The cardinal standing before the choir, lets them know that they were assembled in that consecrate place to sing unto God. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Into these secret shades, cry'd she,

How dar'st thou be so bold

Inter, consecrate to me;

O, touch this hallow'd mold?

Drayton, Cynthia.

The water, consecrate for sacrifice,

Appears all black.

Waller.

CO'NSECRATER, † See CONSECRATOR.

CONSECRA'TION, n. s. [from consecrate.]

1. A rite or ceremony of dedicating and devoting things or persons to the service of God, with an application of certain proper solemnities.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

At the erection and consecration as well of the tabernacle as of the temple, it pleased the Almighty to give a sign. Hooker.

The consecration of his God is upon his head. Numb. vi. 7.

We must know that consecration makes not a place sacred, but only solemnly declares it so: the gift of the owner to God makes it God's, and consequently sacred. South.

2. The act of declaring one holy by canonization.

The calendar swells with new consecrations of saints. Hale.

CO'NSECRATOR, † n. s. [from consecrate.] This is one of our old substantives, being in Fulcr's dictionary. Some editions of Johnson's Dict. read consecrator.] One that performs the rites by which any thing is devoted to sacred purposes.

Whether it be not against the notion of a sacrament, that the consecrator alone should partake of it. Atterbury.

CO'NSECRATORY,  adj.* [from consecrate.] Making sacred.

His words of consecration, which you yourself in your letter do rightly term true consecratory words.

Bp. Morton's Discharge, &c. p. 69.

CONSECTARY, † adj. [from consecrarius, Lat.]

Consequent; consequential; following by consequence.

From the inconsistent and contrary determinations thereof, consecratory impieties and conclusions may arise. Brown.

The consecratory doctrine is, that whereas all things are but one in the individual, and have but one root or beginning, which is God, therefore we should not part his honour among others, but give it wholly to himself.

Shelford's Learned Discourses, p. 176.

CO'NSECTARY, † n. s. [from the adjective.] Deduction from premises; consequence; corollary.

Our synodical proceedings—do shew rather an essential consent in substance, than a conspiring identity in every consecratory.

Divines at the Synod of Dort, 1619. Hales's Rem. p. 186.

The part of this chapter—doth orderly resolve itself into a definition of marriage, and a consecraty from thence.

These propositions are consecraties drawn from the observations.

Milton, Tetrachordon.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONSECUTION. n. s. [consecutio, Lat.]

1. Train of consequences; chain of deductions; concatenation of propositions.

Some consecutions are so intimately and evidently connexed to or found in the premises, that the conclusion is attained, and without any thing of ratiocinative progress.

Hale.

2. Succession.

In a quick consecution of the colours, the impression of every colour remains in the sensorium.

Newton, Opticks.

3. In astronomy.

The month of consecution, or, as some term it, of progression, is the space between one conjunction of the moon with the sun unto another.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The moon makes four quarterly seasons within her little year, or month of consecution.

Holder.

CONSECUTIVE. adj. [consecutivus, Fr.]

1. Following in train; uninterrupted; successive.

That obligation upon the lands did not come into disuse but by fifty consecutive years of exemption.

Arbutnot on Joins.

2. Consequential; regularly succeeding.

This is seeming to comprehend only the actions of a man, consecutive to volition.

Locke.

CONSECUTIVELY. adv. [from consecutive.] A term used in the school philosophy, in opposition to antecedently, and sometimes to effectively or causally.

Dict.

TO CONSEMINATE. v. a. [consemino, Lat.] To sow different seeds together.

Dict.

CONSENSION. n. s. [consensio, Latin.] Agreement; accord.

A great number of such living and thinking particles could not possibly, by their mutual contact, and pressing and striking, compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body.

Bentley.

CONSENT. n. s. [consensus, Lat.]

1. The act of yielding or consenting.

I am far from excusing or denying that compliance; for plenary consent it was not.

K. Charles.

When thou canst truly call these virtues thine, Be wise and free, by heav'n's consent and mine.

Dryden, Pers.

2. Concord; agreement; accord; unity of opinion.

The fighting winds would stop there and admire, Learning consent and concord from his lyre.

Cowley's Davidicis.

Whose power hath a true consent

With planet or with element.

Milton, Il Pens.

4. Tendency to one point; joint operation.

Such is the world's great harmony that springs From union, order, full consent of things.

Pope.

5. In physick.

The perception one part has of another, by means of some fibres and nerves common to them both; and thus the stone in the bladder, by velleitating the fibres there, will effect and draw them so into spasms, as to affect the bowels in the same manner by the intermediation of nervous threads, and cause a colick; and extend their twiches sometimes to the stomach, and occasion vomitings.

Quincy.

TO CONSENT. v. n. [consentio, Lat.]

1. To be of the same mind; to agree.

Though what thou tell'st some doubt within move,

But more desire to hear, if thou consent,

The full relation.

Milton, P. L.

2. To co-operate to the same end.

3. To yield; to give consent; to allow to admit: with to.

Ye comets, scourge the bad revolting stars

That have consented unto Henry's death.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

In this will we consent unto you, if ye will bow we be.

Ge. 3, xxxiv. 15.

What in sleep thou didst abhor to dream,

Waking thou never wilt consent to do.

Milton, P. L.

Their num'rous thunder would awake

Dull earth, which does with heav'n consent

To all they wrote.

Waller.

CONSENTANEOUS. adj. [consentaneus, Lat.] Agreeable to; consistent with.

In the picture of Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac is described a little boy; which is not consentaneous unto the circumstance of the text.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

It will cost no pains to bring you to the knowing, nor to the practice, it being very agreeable and consentaneous to every one's nature.

Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

CONSENTANEOUSLY. adv. [from consentaneous.] Agreeably; consistently; suitably.

Paracelsus did not always write so consentaneously to himself, that his opinions were confidently to be collected from every place of his writings, where he seems to express it.

Boyle.

Nelson, Life of Bp. Bull, p. 237.

CONSEQUENCE. n. s. [consequentia, Latin.]

1. That which follows from any cause or principle.

2. Event; effect of a cause.

Spirits that know

All mortal consequences have pronounc'd it.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Shun the bitter consequence; for know,

The day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die.

Milton, P. L.

3. Proposition collected from the agreement of other previous propositions; deduction; conclusion.

It is no good consequence, that reason aims at our being happy, therefore it forbids all voluntary sufferings.

Dyce of Picty.

4. The last proposition of a syllogism: as, what is commanded by our Saviour is our duty: prayer is commanded, cons. therefore prayer is our duty.

Can syllogism set things right?

No, majors soon with minors fight:

Or, both in friendly consort join'd,

The consequence limps false behind.

Prior.

5. Concatenation of causes and effects; consociation.

Sorrow being the natural and direct offer of sin, that which first brought sin into the world, must, by necessary consequence, bring in sorrow too.

South.

I felt

That I must after thee, with this thy son:

Such fatal consequence unites us three.

Milton, P. L.

6. That consequence produces consequences; influence; tends to any colour of scripture-proof, it is of very ill effect in the superstrucing of good life. Hammond.

7. In the instruments of darkness, to betray us. Shakspeare, Macbeth.
 In the consequence of Achilles was of such consequence, that it embroiled the Greeks of Greece. Addison, Spect.

Their souls are sunk in poverty, ignorance and cowardice; and their subjects are women and children. Swift.

CONSEQUENT. adj. [consequens, Lat.]

1. That follows as the effect of a cause: with to.
 It was the power possible to be inherited, because the right was of antiquity, and built on, an act perfectly personal. Locke.

3. So, in consequence with upon.
 The consequence of or dissatisfaction, consequent upon a man's acting, or unsuitably to conscience, is a principle not easily to be gotten out. South.

CONSEQUENT. n. s.

1. Consequence; that which follows from previous propositions by rational deduction.

Doth it follow that they, being not the people of God, are in nothing to be followed? This consequent were good, if only the custom of the people of God is to be observed. Hooker.

2. Effect; that which follows an acting cause.
 They were ill paid; and they were ill governed, which is always a consequent of ill payment. Davies on Ireland.
 He could see consequents yet dormant in their principles, and effects yet unborn. South.

CONSEQUENTIAL. adj. [from consequent.]

1. Produced by the necessary concatenation of effects to causes.

We sometimes wrangle, when we should debate;
 A consequential ill which freedom draws;
 A bad effect, but from a noble cause. Prior.

2. Having the consequences justly connected with the premises; conclusive.

Though these kind of arguments may seem obscure; yet, upon a due consideration of them, they are highly consequential, and conclusive to my purpose. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

3. Of late years, used for great, conceited, or pompous.

Consequential, in no shape conveys the meaning intended by those, who use it to express a pompous, conceited, lordly man. It can never be applied to a man, unless you were to say, that an undertaker is a man consequential to death; for its use as to men, must be as it is to things, where one follows another of course; as, this is consequential to that, and that is consequential to another. If a word is wanted to express a man of fancied importance, it should naturally have a termination denotative of the circumstance, formed analogous to other words; and I will agree to adopt the term consequentious, which will rank with such as these; contemptuous, litigious, contumacious. Pegge, Anecd. of the Eng. Language.

CONSEQUENTIALLY. adv. [from consequential.]

1. With just deduction of consequences; with right connection of ideas.

No body writes a book without meaning something, though he may not have the faculty of writing consequently, and expressing his meaning. Addison, Whig. Exam.

2. By consequence; not immediately; eventually.

This relation is so necessary, that God himself cannot discharge a rational creature from it; although consequently indeed he may do so, by the annihilation of such creatures. South.

3. In a regular series.

Were a man a king in his dreams, and a beggar awake, and dream consequently, and in continued unbroken schemes, would he be in reality a king or a beggar? Addison.

CONSEQUENTIALNESS. n. s. [from consequential.] Regular consecution of discourse. Dict.

CONSEQUENTLY. adv. [from consequent.]

1. By consequence; necessarily; inevitably; by the connection of effects to their causes.

In the most perfect poem a perfect idea was required, and consequently all poets ought rather to imitate it. Dryden.

The place of the several sorts of terrestrial matter, sustained in the fluid, being contingent and uncertain, their intermixtures with each other are consequently so. Woodward.

2. In consequence; pursuantly.

There is consequently, upon this distinguishing principle, an inward satisfaction or dissatisfaction in the heart of every man, after good or evil. South.

CONSEQUENTNESS. n. s. [from consequent.] Regular connection of propositions; consecution of discourse.

Let them examine the consequentness of the whole body of the doctrine I deliver. Digby on the Soul, Ded.

Not led by any commandment, yet moved with such consi-derations as have been before set down. Hooker, v. § 95.

Uses, not thought upon before, be reasonable causes of retaining that which other considerations did procure to be instituted. Hooker, v. § 42.

8. [In law.] Consideration is the material cause of a contract, without which no contract bindeth. It is either expressed, as if a man bargain to give twenty shillings for a horse; or else implied, as when a man comes into an inn, and taking both meat and lodging for himself and his horse, without bargaining with the host, if he discharge not the house, the host may stay his horse. Cowel.

CONSID'ERATIVE.  adj.* [from considerate.] Taking into consideration.

I'll not dissemble, sir; where'er I come,
I love to be considerative. B. Jonson, For.

CONSID'ERATOR.  n. s.* [from considerate.] He who is given to consideration.

The wisdom of God hath methodized the course of things unto the best advantage of goodness, and thinking considerators overlook not the tract thereof. Brown, Chr. Mor. i. 30.

CONSID'ERER. n. s. [from consider.] A man of reflection; a thinker.

A vain applause of wit for an impious jest, or of reason for a deep considerer. Governm. of the Tongue.

CONSID'ERING. [This is a kind of conjunction: it had been more grammatically written considered; vu, French; but considering is always used.] If allowance be made for.

It is not possible to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature. Spectator.

CONSID'ERING.  n. s.* [from consider.] Hesitation; doubt.

Many maz'd considerings did throng,
And press'd in with this caution. Shakespeare, K. Hen. VIII.

CONSID'ERINGLY.  adv.* [from considering.] In a serious, considerate manner.

The use of this catalogue of sins is this: Upon days of humiliation, especially before the Sacrament, read them consi-deringly over, and at every particular ask thine own heart, Am I guilty of this? Whole Duty of Man, Heads of Self-Exam.

TO CONSI'GN. v. a. [consigno, Lat.]

1. To give to another any thing, with the right to it, in a formal manner; to give into other hands; to transfer. Sometimes with to, sometimes over to.

Men, by free gift, consign over a place to the Divine Worship. South.

Must I pass
Again to nothing, when this vital breath
Ceasing, consigns me o'er to rest and death? Prior.

At the day of general account, good men are then to be consigned over to another state, a state of everlasting love and charity. Atterbury.

2. To appropriate; to quit for a certain purpose.
The French commander consigned it to the use for which it was intended by the donor. Dryden, Fab. Ded.

The four evangelists consigned to writing that history.
Addison.

Atrides, parting for the Trojan war,
Consign'd the youthful consort to his care.

Pope, Odyss.

To CONSIGN. v. n.

1. To submit to the same terms with another. This is not now in use.

Thou hast finish'd joy and moan;

All lovers young, all lovers must

Consign to thee; and come to dust.

Shakspeare, Cymb.

2. To sign; to consent to. Obsolete:

A maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty:
it were a hard condition for a maid to consign to.

Shakspeare.

CONSIGNATION.† n. s. [old Fr. consignation.]

1. The act of consigning; the act by which any thing is delivered up to another.

The princes of Germany sent to him [Francis] a secretary of the Duke's of Bavaria to tell him how, upon the consignation of 100,000 crowns which the said king by treaty was obliged to pay in aid, &c. they now all agreed that it should be put into the hands of the said duke.

Ld. Herbert, Hist. of H. VIII. p. 359.

As the hope of salvation is a good disposition towards it, so is despair a certain consignation to eternal ruin.

Bp. Taylor.

2. The act of signing.

If we find that we increase in duty, then we may look upon the tradition of the Holy sacramental symbols as a direct consignation of pardon.

Bp. Taylor & Worthy Comm.

CONSIGNATURE.* n. s. [old Fr. consignature.] A full stamping, or absolute signature, of. Cotgrave.

CONSIGNIFICATION.* n. s. [con and signification.] Similar signification.

Harris, Philolog. Inq.

CONSIGNMENT.† n. s. [from consign.]

1. The act of consigning.

Ask all the merchants who act upon consignments, where is the necessity, (if they answer readily what their correspondents draw) of their being wealthy themselves.

Tatler, No. 31.

2. The writing by which any thing is consigned.

CONSIMILAR. adj. [from consimilis, Lat.] Having one common resemblance. Dict.

CONSIMILITUDE.* n. s. [old Fr. consimilitude, from the Lat. con and similitudo.] Likeness; concurrence; equality; agreement together. Cotgrave.

CONSIMILITY.* n. s. [Lat. consimilis.] Resemblance. By which means, and their consimilarity of disposition, there was a very conjunct friendship between the two brothers and him.

Aubrey, Aucc. of Sir W. Raleigh, ii. 511.

To CONSIST. v. n. [consisto, Lat.]

1. To subsist; not to perish.

He is before all things, and by him all things consist.

Col. i. 17.

2. To continue fixed; without dissipation.

Flame doth not mingle with flame, as air doth with air, or water with water, but only remaineth contiguous; as it cometh to pass betwixt consisting bodies.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

It is against the nature of water, being a flexible and ponderous body, to consist and stay itself, and not fall to the lower parts about it.

Brewerwood on Languages.

3. To be comprised; to be contained.

I pretend not to tie the hands of artists, whose skill consists only in a certain manner which they have affected.

Dryden.

A great beauty of letters does often consist in little passages of private conversation, and references to particular matters.

Walsh.

The land would consist of plains and valleys, and mountains according as the pieces of this ruin were disposed.

Burnet.

5. To have being concurrently; to coexist.

Necessity and election cannot consist together in the same act.

Bp. Bramhall, against Hobbes.

6. To agree; not to oppose; not to contradict; not to counteract: it has with before the thing compared or co-existent.

His majesty would be willing to consent to any thing that could consist with his conscience and honour.

Clarendon.

Nothing but what may easily consist with your plenty, your prosperity, is requested of you.

South, Serm.

You could not help bestowing more than is consistent with the fortune of a private man, or with the will of Alexander.

Dryden, Fab. Ded.

It cannot consist with the Divine Attributes, that the impious man's joys should, upon the whole, exceed those of the upright.

Atterbury.

Health consists with temperance alone.

Pope.

The only way of securing the constitution will be by lessening the power of domestick adversaries, as much as can consist with lenity.

Swift.

CONSISTENCE.† } n. s. [consistentia, low Lat.]

CONSISTENCY. }

1. State with respect to material existence.

Water, being divided, maketh many circles, 'till it restore itself to the natural consistence.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The consistencies of bodies are very divers: dense, rare, tangible, pneumatical, volatile, fixed, determinate, indeterminate, hard, and soft.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

There is the same necessity for the Divine influence and regimen to order and govern, conserve and keep together the universe in that consistence it hath received, as it was at first to give it, before it could receive it.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

I carried on my enquiries farther, to try whether this rising world, when formed and finished, would continue always the same, in the same form, structure, and consistency.

Burnet.

2. Degree of denseness or rarity.

Let the expressed juices be boiled into the consistence of a syrup.

Arbutnot on Alim.

3. Substance; form; make.

His friendship is of a noble make, and a lasting consistency.

South, Serm.

4. Durable or lasting state.

Meditation will confirm resolutions of good, and give them a durable consistence in the soul.

Hammond.

These are fundamental truths that lie at the bottom, the basis upon which many others rest, and in which they have their consistencies teenning and rich in store, with which they furnish the mind.

Locke.

5. Agreement with itself, or with any other thing; congruity; uniformity.

That consistency of behaviour, whereby he inflexibly pursues those measures, which appear the most just and equitable.

Addison, Freeholder.

6. A state of rest, in which things capable of growth or decrease continue for some time at a stand, without either; as the growth, consistence, and return.

Chambers.

Even there [in the heaven] I find a change, of motion, of face, of quality; motion whether by consistence or retrogradation; "Sun, stand thou still in Gibeon, and thou moon in the valley of Aialon;" there was a change in not moving. And for retrogradation; "The shadow went back ten degrees in the dial of Ahaz."

Seasonable Serm. p. 2.

CONSISTENT. adj. [consistens, Lat.]

1. Not contradictory: not opposed.

With reference to such a lord, to serve and to be free, are terms not consistent only, but equivalent.

South.

A great part of their politicks others do not think consistent with honour to practise.

Addison on Italy.

On their own axis as the planets run, Yet make at once their circle round the sun; So two consistent motions act the soul, And one regards itself, and one the whole.

Pope, Ess.

Shew me one that has it in his power

To act consistent with himself an hour.

Pope, Epist. of Hor.

The fool consistent, and the false sincere, bracket, or shoulder-piece, serving to support a cornice, bust, vase, beam, and frequently used as keys of arches. Chambers.

Pope, Epist.

CONSOLE^R. n. s. [from console.] One that gives comfort.

Pride once more appears upon the stage, as the great console of the miseries of man.

Comment. on Pope's Ess. on Man.

CONSO^LIDANT. adj. [from consolidate.] That which has the quality of uniting wounds.

To CONSO^LIDATE.† v. a. [consolider, Fr. solidus, Latin.]

1. To form into a compact and solid body; to harden; to unite into a solid mass.

The word may be rendered either he stretched, or he fixed and consolidated the earth above the waters. Burnet's Theory.

The effect of spirits in stopping hemorrhages, and consolidating the fibres, is well known to surgeons. Arbuthnot.

2. To combine or unite two parliamentary bills into one. See CONSOLIDATION.

3. To unite two benefices into one. See CONSOLIDATION.

To CONSO^LIDATE. v. n. To grow firm, hard, or solid.

In hurts and ulcers in the head, dryness maketh them more apt to consolidate.

The sandy, sparry, and flinty matter was open and susceptible of any form in these shelly moulds; and it consolidated, and became hard afterwards. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONSO^LIDATE.* adj. Formed into a compact body; fixed: settled.

It shall be necessary, that a gentleman do learn to ride a great and fierce horse while he is tender, and the brawnes and sinewes of his thighs not fully consolidate. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 58.

The pure religion of Christ was not in all places consolidate. Ibid. fol. 62. b.

CONSOLIDA^TION.† n. s. [from consolidate.]

1. The act of uniting into a solid mass.

The consolidation of the marble, and of the stone, did not fall out at random. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The act of confirming a thing.

He first offered a league to Henry the seventh, and for consolidation thereof his daughter Margaret.

Ld. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 11.

3. The annexing of one bill in parliament to another. This appears to be of no great age in our language, by the following example.

It was some surprize to me to find myself translated all on a sudden into this bill against the directors, under the new-fashioned term of consolidation, without any new offence given, or cause assigned: — However, I now find myself tacked to them and their unhappy fate.

Speech of the Rt. Hon. J. Aislabie bef. the H. of L. Jul. 19. 1721.

4. In law, it is used for the combining and uniting of two benefices in one. Cordell.

CONSO^LIDATIVE. adj. [from consolidate.] That which has the quality of healing wounds. Dict.

CO^NSONANCE. } n. s. [consonance, Fr. consonans,
CO^NSONANCY. } Latin.]

1. Accord of sound.

The two principal consonances that most ravish the ear, are, by the consent of all nature, the fifth and the octave. Wotton.
And winds and waters flow'd

In consonance. Thomson, Spring.

2. Consistency; congruence; agreeableness.

Such decisions held consonancy and congruity with resolutions and decisions of former times. Hale's Law of England.

I have set down this, to shew the perfect consonancy of our persecuted church to the doctrine of scripture and antiquity.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

Agreement; concord; friendship. A sense now not used.

Let me conjure you by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CONSONANT.† adj. [old Fr. consonant, consonans, Lat.]

1. Agreeable; according; consistent; followed by either with or to.

Where it consonant unto reason to divorce these two sentences, the former of which doth shew how enthusiastic is restrained? Hooker.

That where much is given there shall be much required, is a thing consonant with natural equity. Decay of Piety.

Religion looks consonant to itself. Decay of Piety.

He discovers how consonant the account which Moses hath left, of the primitive earth, is to this from nature. Woodward.

2. Agreeing: without to or with.

Our harsh — hold agnominations, and enforcing of consonant words or syllables one upon the other, to be the greatest elegance. Howell, Lett. i. i. 40.

CONSONANT. n. s. [consonans, Latin.] A letter which cannot be sounded, or but imperfectly, by itself.

In all vowels the passage of the mouth is open and free, without any appulse of an organ of speech to another: but in all consonants there is an appulse of the organs, sometimes (if you abstract the consonants from the vowels) wholly precluding all sound; and, in all of them, more or less checking and abetting it. Holder, Elem. of Speech.

He considered these as they had a greater mixture of vowels or consonants, and accordingly employed them as the verse required a greater smoothness. Pope, Ess. on Homer.

CO^NSONANTLY. adv. [from consonant.] Consistently; agreeably.

This as consonantly it preacheth, teacheth, and delivereth, as if but one tongue did speak for all. Hooker.

Ourselves are formed according to that mind which frames things consonantly to their respective natures.

Glauville, Scenics.

If he will speak consonantly to himself, he must say that happened in the original constitution. Tillotson.

CO^NSONANTNESS. n. s. [from consonant.] Agreeableness; consistency. Dict.

CO^NSONOUS. adj. [consonus, Latin.] Agreeing in sound; symphonious.

To CONSO^PITE.* v. a. [Lat. consopio; but the regular derivation must be consopite, which, as well as consopiate, is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson; though he has admitted consopiation. This verb is not now in use; but our old vocabularies present the participle consopiated. Consopite is supported by good authority.] To lull asleep. Cockeram.

CONSOPIA^TION.† n. s. [from consopiate.] The act of laying to sleep. Little in use.

One of his maxims is, that a total abstinence from intemperance is no more philosophy than a total consopiation of the senses is repose. Pope, to Dugby.

To CONSOPI^TE.* v. a. [Lat. consopio.] To compose; to calm; to lull asleep.

The masculine faculties of the soul were for a while well slaked and consopited. More, Cong. Cabb. (1653.) p. 68.

By the same degrees that the higher powers are invigorated, the lower are consopited and abated, as to their proper exercises. Glauville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 108.

The higher powers of the soul being almost quite laid asleep and consopited. Ibid. p. 121.

CO^NSOPITE.* adj. [from the verb.] Calmed; quieted; composed.

I have the barking of bold sense confuted; Its clamorous tongue thus being consopite, With reasons easy seduced I well be suited, To shew that Pythagore's position's right.

More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 43.

CONSORT. † n. s. [consors, Latin. It had anciently the accent on the latter syllable, but has it now on the former. Milton has used them both.]

1. Companion; partner; generally a partner of the bed; a wife or husband.

experie. Fellowship.
Such a progress to participate,
All rat complete; wherein the brute
Cannot take main consort.

Milton, P. L.

Male he created thee; but thy consort
Female for race: then bless'd mankind, and said,
Be fruitful, multiply, and fill the earth.

Milton, P. I.

Thy Bellona, who thy consort came

Not only to thy bed, but to thy fame.

Denham.

He single chose to live, and shun'd to wed,

Well pleas'd to want a consort of his bed.

Dryden, Fables.

His warlike amazon her host invades,

The imperial consort of the crown of Spades.

Pope.

2. An assembly; a divan; a consultation.

In one consort there sat
Cruel revenge, and rancorous despite,
Disloyal treason, and heart-burning hate.

Spenser, F. Q.

3. A number of instruments playing together; a symphony. This is probably a mistake for concert, Dr. Johnson says. It is not so. Concert was certainly so written, at the beginning of the last century, and probably much beyond that time. The Italian concert banished it; and now we have also concerto. A "consort of musicians" means indeed a company of musicians, a band, as it is now called. Our old lexicography exhibits this phrase, which might be amply illustrated, if necessary, by passages in our old dramas. See also Bullokar's Expositor, ed. 1656. And see CONCERT.

A consort of musick in a banquet of wine, is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold.

Eccles. xxxii. 5.

4. Concurrence; union.

Take it singly, and it carries an air of levity: but, in consort with the rest, has a meaning quite different.

Atterbury.

To CONSO'RT. † v. n. [from the noun.] To associate with; to unite with; to keep company with.

What will you do? Let's not consort with them.

Shakspeare, c.

All flesh consorteth according to kind; and a man will cleave to his like.

Eccles. xiii. 16.

Some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas.

Acts, xvii. 4.

Which of the Grecian chiefs consorts with thee?

Dryden.

To CONSO'RT. † v. a.

1. To join; to mix; to marry.

He, with his consorted Eve,
The story heard attentive.

Milton, P. P.

He begins to consort himself with men, and thinks himself one.

Locke on Education.

2. To accompany. Not used, Dr. Johnson says. This is certainly not the case: for the word has been well employed in this sense.

Sweet health and fair desires consort your graces.

It is a special prerogative of beauty, though it be in an humble and mean subject, if it be consorted with modesty and virtue, to exalt and equal itself to any dignity.

Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iv. 9.

CONSO'RTABLE. † adj. [from consort.] To be compared with; to be ranked with; suitable. Not now used.

He was much more conso'rtable to Charles Brandon, under Henry VIII. who was equal to him.

Wotton.

A good conscience, and a good courtier, are conso'rtable.

W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648), p. 98.

CONSO'RTION. † n. s. [consortio, Lat.] Partnership; fellowship; society.

Dict.

While others are curious in the choice of good air, and chiefly solicitous for healthful habitations, study thou conversation, and be critic'd in thy consortion.

Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 9.

CO'NSORTSHIP. * n. s. [from consort.] Fellowship; state of union; partnership.

Thus, consulting wisely with the state of times, and the child's disposition and abilities of containing, must the parent either keep his virgin, or labour for the provision of a meet consortship.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. iv. 1.

For their having been unkind, and unmerciful to their poor brethren, they shall be cursed, and cast down into a wretched consortship with those malicious and merciless fiends, unto whose dispositions they did so nearly approach.

Barrow, Serm. i. S. 31.

CONSPÉ'CTABLE. adj. [from conspéctus, Lat.] Easy to be seen.

Dict.

CONSPÉ'CTION. * n. s. [old Fr. conspéction.] A seeing; a beholding.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

CONSPÉCTU'ITY. n. s. [from conspéctus, Lat.] Sight; view; sense of seeing. This word is, I believe, peculiar to Shakspeare, and perhaps corrupt.

What harm can your bisson conspéctuities glean out of this character?

Shakspeare, Coriol.

CONSPÉ'RSION. n. s. [conspersio, Lat.] A sprinkling about.

Dict.

CONSPICU'ITY. n. s. [from conspicuous.] Brightness; favourableness to the sight.

If this definition be clearer than the thing defined, midnight may vie for conspicuity with noon.

Glanville, Seppsis.

CONSPICUOUS. adj. [conspicuus, Lat.]

1. Obvious to the sight; seen at a distance.

Or come I less conspicuous? Or what change
Absents thee?

Milton, P. L.

2. Eminent; famous; distinguished.

He attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought most conspicuous in them.

Dryden, Juv. Ded.

Thy father's merit points thee out to view,

And sets thee in the fairest point of light,

To make thy virtues or thy faults conspicuous.

Addison, Cato.

The house of lords,

Conspicuous scene!

Pope, Epist. of Horace.

CONSPICUOUSLY. adv. [from conspicuous.]

1. Obviously to the view.

These methods may be preserved conspicuously, and intirely distinct.

Watts, Logic.

2. Eminently; famously; remarkably.

CONSPICUOUSNESS. n. s. [from conspicuous.]

1. Exposure to the view; state of being visible at a distance.

Looked on with such a weak light, they appear well proportioned fabricks; yet they appear so but in that twilight, which is requisite to their conspicuousness.

Boyle, Proem. Essay.

2. Eminence; fame; celebrity.

Their writings attract more readers by the author's conspicuousness.

Boyle on Colours.

CONSPI'RACY. n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.]

1. A private agreement among several persons to commit some crime; a plot; a concerted treason.

O conspiracy!

Sham'st thou to shew thy dangerous brow by night,

When evils are most free?

Shakspeare, Jul. Cas.

I had forgot that foul conspiracy

Of the beast Caliban, and his confederates,

Against my life.

Shakspeare, Tempest.

When scarce he had escap'd the blow

Of faction and conspiracy,

Death did his promis'd hopes destroy.

Dryden

2. In law, an agreement of men to do any thing; always taken in the evil part. It is taken for a confederacy of two at the least, falsely to indict one, or to procure one to be indicted of felony.

Cowel.

3. A concurrence; a general tendency of many causes to one event.

When the time now came that misery was ripe for him, there was a conspiracy in all heavenly and earthly things, to frame fit occasions to lead him unto it.

Sidney.

The air appearing so malicious in this morbid conspiracy, exacts a more particular regard.

Harvey on Consumptions.

- CONSPIRANT. adj. [conspirans, Lat.] Conspiring; engaged in a conspiracy or plot; plotting.

Thou art a traitor,

Conspirant 'gainst this high illustrious prince.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

- CONSPIRATION.† n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.] An agreement of many to one end.

One would wonder, how from so differing premisses, they should infer the same conclusion, were it not that the conspiracy of interest were too potent for the diversity of judgement.

Decay of Piety.

The same [duty of praise] must also be publick and united, universal and unlimited, with a general consent and holy kind of conspiration.

Bp. Pearson, Sermon, Nov. 5. 1673.

What an harmony and conspiration there is betwixt all these laws, one mutually aiding and assisting the other.

Hammond, of Conscience, § 28.

- CONSPIRATOR. n. s. [from conspiro, Lat.] A man engaged in a plot; one who has secretly concerted with others commission of a crime; a plotter.

Achitophel is among the conspirators with Absalom.

2 Sam. xv. 31.

Stand back, thou manifest conspirator;
Thou that contriv'st to murder our dread lord.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

But let the bold conspirator beware;
For heav'n makes princes its peculiar care.

Dryden, Sp. Fryar.

One put into his hand a note of the whole conspiracy against him, together with all the names of the conspirators.

South.

- To CONSPIRE. v. n. [conspiro, Lat.]

1. To concert a crime; to plot; to hatch secret treason.

Tell me what they deserve,
That do conspire my death with devilish plots
Of damned witchcraft?

Shakespeare, Rich. III.

What was it
That mov'd pale Cassius to conspire?

Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

They took great indignation, and conspired against the king.

Apocrypha, Bel. and the Drag. v. 28.

Let the air be excluded; for that undermineth the body, and conspireth with the spirit of the body to dissolve it.

Baron.

There is in man a natural possibility to destroy the world; that is, to conspire to know no woman.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

The press, the pulpit, and the stage,
Conspire to censure and expose our age.

Roscommon.

2. To agree together: as, all things conspire to make him happy.

So moist and dry when Phœbus shines,
Conspiring give the plant to grow.

Heigh.

- CONSPIRER.† n. s. [from conspire.] A conspirator; a plotter.

Take no care,

Who chafes, who frets, and where conspirers are;
Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be.

Shakespeare, Macbeth.

But these conspirers couched all so cleane
Through close demeanour, that their wiles did weane
My heart from doubts.

Mir. for Mag. p. 406.

CONSPIRING Powers. [In mechanicks.] All such as act in direction not opposite to one another. Harris.

CONSPIRINGLY.* adv. [from conspiring.] In a manner criminally concerted.

Either violently without mutual consent for urgent reasons, or conspiringly by plot of lust and cunning malice.

Milton, Tetra chordon.

CONSPISSATION.* n. s. [Lat. conspissatio.] Thickness.

For body's but this spirit, fixt, gross by conspissation.

More, Infin. of Worlds, st. 13.

To CONSPURCATE.* v. a. [Lat. conspurgo.] To defile.

Cockeram.

CONSPURCATION.† n. s. [from conspurgo, Lat.] The act of defiling; defilement; pollution. It is in our old vocabularies, and is used by Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 162.

CONSTABLE.† n. s. [comes stabuli, as it is supposed, Dr. Johnson says; in which many agree with him; comes stabuli meaning the master of the stables, or master of the horse, and thence perhaps a commander of cavalry. But our antiquaries, Verstegan and Selden, in particular, refer the word to the Sax. cynn, contracted into KING; and to stable or staple; signifying a prop or stay, the whole word constable being thus as much as columna regis, or one that he especially depends upon in managing his most weighty affairs. This etymology is supported by the occurrence of cunestabula in Domesday Book for maintainer of the king's right. Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in his own Life, p. 44., observes, that "Constable, anciently in France, was the first officer of the army, and so called from appointing the king a place in which he was to stand in the day of battle."]

1. Lord high constable is an ancient officer of the crown. The function of the constable of England consisted in the care of the common peace of the land in deeds of arms, and in matters of war. To the court of the constable and marshal belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blasonry of arms within it. The first constable of England was created by the Conqueror, and the office continued hereditary 'till the thirteenth of Henry VIII. when it was laid aside, as being so powerful as to become troublesome to the king. From these mighty magistrates are derived the inferior constables of hundreds and franchises; two of whom were ordained, in the thirteenth of Edward I. to be chosen in every hundred for the conservation of the peace, and view of armour. These are now called high constables, because continuance of time, and increase both of people and offences, have occasioned others in every town of inferior authority, called petty constables. Besides these, we have constables denominated from particular places; as, constable of the Tower, of Dover castle, of the castle of Carnarvon; but these are properly castellani, or governors of castles.

Cowel, and Chambers.

When I came hither, I was lord high constable,

And duke of Buckingham; now poor Edward Bohun.

Shakespeare

The knave constable had set me i' th' stocks, i' th' common stocks, for a witch.

Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

The constable being a sober man, and an enemy to sedition, went to observe what they did.

Clarke

2. To over-run the CONSTABLE. [Perhaps from conte stable, Fr. the settled, firm, and stated account.] To spend more than what a man knows himself to be worth: a low phrase.

CO'NSTABLESHIP. n. s. [from constable.] The office of a constable.
This ke Relie is annexed to the constableness of the castle, and that £ ... out in lease. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

CO'NSTABLEWICK. * n. s. The district over which the authority of a constable extends.

If directed to the constable of D. he is not bound to execute the warrant out of the precincts of his constablewick.

Hale, Hist. Pl. of the Cr. ch. 50.

CO'NSTANCY. n. s. [constantia, Lat.]

1. Immutability; perpetuity; unalterable continuance.

The laws of God himself no man will ever deny to be of a different constitution from the former, in respect of the one's constancy, and the mutability of the other. Hooker.

2. Consistency; unvaried state.

Incredible, that constancy in such a variety, such a multiplicity, should be the result of chance. Ray on the Creation.

3. Resolution; firmness; steadiness; unshaken determination.

In a small isle, amidst the widest seas, Triumphant constancy has fix'd her seat; In vain the syrens sing, the tempests beat. Prior.

4. Lasting affection; continuance of love, or friendship.

Constancy is such a stability and firmness of friendship, as overlooks and passes by lesser failures of kindness, and yet still retains the same habitual good-will to a friend. South.

5. Certainty; veracity; reality.

But all the story of the night told over, More witnesseth than fancy's images, And grows to something of great constancy, But, however, strange and admirable. Shakspeare.

CONSTANT. † adj. [constans, Lat.]

He shewed his firm adherence to religion as modelled by our national constitution, and was constant to its offices in devotion, both in publick and in his family. Addison, Freeholder.

CONSTANTIA Wine. * Wine, both red and white, so named from the village of Constantia at the Cape of Good Hope, where the vines, which produce this luscious but heavy liquor, are cultivated. The grape from which it is extracted, is a species of the muscadel.

CONSTANTINOPOLITAN Creed. * The Nicene Creed, with additions made by the council of Constantinople.

Divers of the Greeks expressly denied the procession from the Son, and several disputations did arise in the Western church, till at last the Latins put it into the Constantinopolitan creed; and being admonished by the Greeks of that, as an unlawful addition, and refusing to rase it out of the creed again, it became an occasion of vast schism between the Eastern and the Western churches.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. viii.

If you examine those articles that follow after the Constantinopolitan creed, you will find they are not merely explanatory of any article or articles of the old canon of faith; — but they are plain additions to the Rule of Faith.

Bp. Bull, Corrupt. of the Ch. of Rome.

CONSTANTLY. † adv. [from constant.]

1. Unvariably; perpetually; certainly; steadily.

It is strange that the fathers should never appeal; nay, that they should not constantly do it. Tillotson.

CONTENTFULLY.  adv.* [from contentful.] In a perfectly contented way. Hulot.

CONTENTION.  n. s.* [contentio, Lat. It has been well observed to me by a learned friend, that the three significations, as arranged by Johnson, should be reversed. Eagerness is the primary signification. Emulation is the next, because eagerness is apt to produce emulation. And Strife is the third, as emulation is apt to produce strife.]

1. Strife; debate; contest; quarrel; mutual opposition.

Can we with manner ask what was the difference?

Safely, I think; 'twas a contentum in publick. Shakespeare.
Avoid foolish questions and genealogies, and contentions and strivings. Tit. iii. 9.

Can they keep themselves in a perpetual contentum with their case, their reason, and their God, and not endure a short combat with a sinful custom. Decay of Piety.

The ancients made contentum the principle that reigned in the chaos at first, and then love; the one to express the divisions, and the other the union of all parties in the middle and common bond. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Emulation; endeavour to excel.

Sons and brother at a strife!

What is your quarrel? how began it first?

No quarrel, but a sweet contentum. Shakespeare, H. VI.

3. Eagerness; zeal; ardor; vehemence of endeavour.

Your own earnestness and contentum to effect what you are about, will continually suggest to you several artifices. Holder.

This is an end, which, at first view, appears worthy our utmost contentum to obtain. Rogers.

CONTENTIOUS.  adj.* [old Fr. contentieux.] Quarrelsome; given to debate; perverse; not peaceable.

Thou think'st much that this contentious storm
Invades us to the skin. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

There are certain contentious humours that are never to be pleased. I. Strange.

Rest made them idle, idleness made them curious, and curiosity contentious. Decay of Piety.

CONTENTIOUS Jurisdiction. [In law.] A court which has a power to judge and determine differences between contending parties. The lord chief justices, and judges, have a contentious jurisdiction; but the lords of the treasury, and the commissioners of the customs, have none, being merely judges of accounts and transactions. Chambers.

CONTENTIOUSLY. adv. [from contentious.] Perversely; quarrelsomely.

We shall not contentiously reject, or only to justify our own, but to applaud and confirm his maturer assertions. Brown.

CONTENTIOUSNESS.  n. s.* [from contentious.] Perverseness to contest; perverseness; turbulence; quarrelsomeness.

Contentiousness in a feast of charity is more scandal than any posture. Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 22.

Do not contentiousness and cruelty, and study of revenge, seldom fail of retaliation? Bentley, Sermon.

CONTENTLESS. adj. [from content.] Discontented; dissatisfied; uneasy.

Best state, contentless,

Have a distracted and most wretched being,
Worse than the worst content. Shakespeare, Timon.

CONTENTLY.  adv.* [from content.] In a quiet, contented way.

We'll away unto your country house,
And there we'll learn to live contently. Braun, and Pl. Rule a Wife.

CONTENTMENT.  n. s.* [old Fr. contentement.]

1. Acquiescence without pleary satisfaction.

Such men's contentment must be wrought by stratagem; the usual method of fare is not for them. Hooker.

Submission is the only reasoning between a creature and its Maker, and contentment in his will is the best remedy we can apply to misfortunes. Temple.

Contentment, without external honour, is humility; without the pleasure of eating, temperance. Green, Cosmol.

Some place the bliss in action, some in ease,
Those call it pleasure, and contentment these. Pope, Ess.

But now no face divine contentment wears,
'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears. Pope.

2. Gratification.

At Paris the prince spent one whole day, to give his mind some contentment in viewing of a famous city. Wotton.

Let my heart so joy in the assured expectation of it, that it may disrelish all the contentments, and condemn all the crosses, which this world can afford me. Bp. Hall, Soliloq. 57.

CONTERMINABLE.* adj. [from the Lat. contermino.] Capable of the same bounds.

There succeeded in the same place the departure of my no less dear niece, your long, and I dare say, your still beloved consort, (for love and life are not conterminable;) as well appeareth by your many tender expressions of that disjuncture. Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

CONTERMINATE.* adj. [Lat. contermino, conterminatum.] That which hath the same bounds.

Here are kingdoms mix'd

And nations join'd, a strength of empire fix'd

Conterminat with heaven. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CONTERMINOUS.* adj. [conterminus, Latin.] Bordering upon; touching at the boundaries.

This conformed so many of them, as were conterminous to the colonies and garrisons, to the Roman laws. Hale.

CONTERREANEAN.* adj. [Lat. conterraneus.] Of the same earth or country.

I hold that of the orator to be a wild extravagant speech, That if women were not conterranean and mingled with men, angels would descend and dwell among us. Howell, Lett. iv. 7.

CONTERRENEOUS.* adj. [conterraneus, Latin.] Of the same country. Dict.

CONTESSERATION.* n. s. [from the Lat. con and teseratus, variegated.] Assemblage; collection.

I have not, so much as with one dash of a pencil, offered to describe that person of his, which afforded so unusual a contesseration of elegancies, and set of rarities to the beholder.

B. Oley's Life of G. Herbert, (1671,) sign. O. 5.

To CONTEST. v. a. [contester, Fr., probably from contra testari, Latin.] To dispute; to controvert; to litigate; to call in question.

'Tis evident, upon what account none have presumed to contest the proportion of these ancient pieces. Dryden, Duf.

To CONTEST. v. n.

1. To strive; to contend: followed by with.

Contesting not with them, nor contradicting them with the spirit of frowardness. Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 146.

The difficulty of an argument adds to the pleasure of contesting with it, when there are hopes of victory. Burnet.

2. To vie; to emulate.

I do contest

As hotly and as nobly with thy love,

As ever in ambitious strength I did

Contend against thy valour.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

Of man, who dares in pomp with Jove contest,

Unchang'd, immortal, and supremely blest? Pope, Odys.

CONTEST. n. s. [from the verb. It is now accented on the first syllable.] Dispute; difference; debate.

This of old no less contests did move,

Than when for Homer's birth sev'n cities strove. Denham.

A definition is the only way whereby the meaning of words can be known, without leaving room for contest about it. Locke.

Leave all noisy contests, all immodest clamours, and brawling language. Watts.

CONTESTABLE.* adj. [from contest.] That may be contested or disputable; controvertible.

CONTESTABLE.* n. s. [from contestable.] Possibility of contesting; challenge.

CONTESTABLE.* n. s. [from contest.] The act of contesting; strife.

After years spent in domestick, unsociable contestations, she found means to withdraw. Clarendon.

CONTESTATION.* n. s. [old Fr. contestation, Lat. contestor, to witness.] Testimony; proof by witnesses.

We are all as well baptized into the name of the Holy Spirit, as of the Father and Son, wherein is signified, and by a solemn contestation ratified on the part of God, that those three joined are conspiringly propitious and favourable to us.

Barrow, Sermon. ii. S. 34.

CONTESTINGLY.* adv. [from To Contest.] In a contending manner.

The more contestingly they set their reason to explain them, the more difficult they, perhaps, will find them at that conjuncture. W. Montaigne, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 371.

CONTESTLESS.* adj. [from contest and less.] Not to be disputed.

Modest sense

Of my unequal worth compell'd some doubting;

But now 'tis truth contestless.

A. Hill.

To CONTEX. v. a. [contexo, Latin.] To weave together; to unite by interposition of parts. This word is not in use.

Nature may contex a plant, though that be a perfectly mixt concrete, without having all the elements previously presented to her to compound it of. Boyle.

The fluid body of quicksilver is contexed with the salts it carries up in sublimation. Boyle.

CONTEXT. n. s. [contextus, Latin.] The general series of a discourse; the parts of the discourse that precede and follow the sentence quoted.

That chapter is really a representation of one, which hath only the knowledge, not practice of his duty; as is manifest from the context. Hammond on Fundamentals.

CONTEXT.* adj. [from contex.] Knit together; firm.

Hollow and thin, for lightness; but withal context and firm, for strength. Derham, Phys. Theol.

To CONTEXT.* v. a. [from the noun.] To knit together. An unusual but useful verb.

This were to unglew the whole world's frame, which is contexted only by commerce and contracts.

Junius, Sin Stigmat. (1639,) p. 776.

CONTEXTURAL.* adj. [from contexture.] Relating to the human frame.

Again, the contextural expressions are of the self same nature.

Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 182.

CONTEXTURE. n. s. [from contex.] The disposition of parts one amongst others; the composition of any thing out of separate parts; the system; the constitution; the manner in which any thing is woven or formed.

He was not of any delicate contexture; his limbs rather sturdy than dainty. Wotton.

Every species, afterwards expressed, was produced from that idea, forming that wonderful contexture of created beings.

Dryden, Dufresnoy.

Hence 'gan relax

The ground's contexture; hence Tartarian dregs,
Sulphur, and vitrous spume, enkindling fierce,
Bellow'd within their darksome caves.

Philips.

This apt, this wise contexture of the sea,

Makes it the ships, driv'n by the winds, obey:

Whence hardy merchants sail from shore to shore. Blackmore.

CONTIGNATION.* n. s. [contignatio, Latin.]

A frame of beams joined together; a story.

We mean a porch, or cloister, or the like, of one contignation, and not in storied buildings. Wotton, Architecture.

Where more of these orders than one shall be set in several stories or contignations, there must be an exquisite care to place the columns precisely one over another. Ibid.

contignation of their houses. Gregory's Works, p. 10.

2. The act of framing or joining a fabrick of wood.
Their own buildings—were without any party-wall, and linked by a contignation into the edifice of France. Burke.

CONTIGUITY.† n. s. [from contiguus.] Actual contact; situation in which two bodies or countries touch upon each other.

He defined magetical attraction to be a natural imitation and disposition conforming unto contiguity. Brown.

The immediate contiguity of that convex were a real space.
Hale, Orig. of Mank.

The bishop having first stated the convicinity and contiguity of the two parishes. Warton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 18.

CONTIGUOUS. adj. [contiguus, Lat.]

1. Meeting so as to touch; bordering upon each other; not separate.

Flame doth not mingle with flame as air doth with air, or water with water, but only remaineth contiguous, as it cometh to pass betwixt consisting bodies. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The loud misrule
Of chaos far remov'd; lest fierce extremes,
Contiguous, might distemper the whole frame. Milton, P. L.

By the East and West
Upon the globe, a mathematick point
Only divides: thus happiness and misery,
And all extremes, are still contiguous. Denham, Sophy.

Distinguish them by the diminution of the lights and shadows, joining the contiguous object, by the participation of their colours. Dryden, Dufres.

When I viewed it too near, the two halves of the paper did not appear fully divided from one another, but seemed conti- guous at one of their angles. Newton, Opt.

2. It has sometimes with.
Water, being contiguous with air, cooleth it, but moisteneth it not. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONTIGUOUSLY. adv. [from contiguous.] Without any intervening spaces.

Thus disembroll'd, they take their proper place,
The next of kin contiguously embrace,
And foes are sunder'd by a larger space. Dryden, Ovid.

CONTIGUOUSNESS.† n. s. [from contiguous.] Close connection; coherence.

The suspicious houses, as if afraid to be infected with more misery than they have already, by contiguousness to others, keep off at a distance, having many waste places betwixt them.
Fuller's Holy War, p. 276.

CO'NTINENCE. } n. s. [continentia, Lat.]

CO'NTINENCY. }

1. Restraint; command of one's self.
He knew what to say; he knew also when to leave off, a continence which is practised by few writers. Dryden, Fob. Pref.

2. Forbearance of lawful pleasure.
Content without lawful vengery, is continence; without unlawful, chastity. Grew, Cosmol.

3. Chastity in general.
Where is he?
— In her chamber, making a sermon of continency to her,
and rails, and swears, and rates. Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Suffer not dishonour to approach
Th' imperial seat; to virtue consecrate,
To justice, continence, and nobility. Titus Andronicus.

4. Moderation in lawful pleasures.
Chastity is either abstinence or continence: abstinence is that of virgins or widows; continence, of married persons.
Bp. Taylor.

5. Continuity; uninterrupted course.
Answers ought to be made before the same judge, before whom the depositions were produced, lest the continence of the course should be divided; or, in other terms, lest there should be a discontinuance of the cause. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CON

CO'NTINENT.† adj. [continens, Lat.; continent, old Fr.]

1. Chaste; abstemious in lawful pleasures.

Life
Hath been as continent, as chaste, as true,
As I am now unhappy? Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.
A shamesfaced and faithful woman is a double grace, and her continent mind cannot be valued. Eccles. xxvi. 15.

2. Restrained; moderate; temperate.
I pray you, have a continent forbearance, 'till the speed of his rage goes slower. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. Continuous; connected.
The North-east part of Asia is, if not continent with the West side of America, yet certainly it is the least disjointed by sea of all that coast of Asia. Brerewood on Languages.

4. Opposing; restraining.
My desire
All continent impediments would o'erbear,
That did oppose my will. Shakspeare.

CO'NTINENT.† n. s. [continens, Lat.]

1. Land not disjointed by the sea from other lands.
Whether this portion of the world were rent,
By the rude ocean, from the continent;
Or thus created, it was sure design'd
To be the sacred refuge of mankind. Waller.

The declivity of rivers will be so much the less, and therefore the continents will be the less drained, and will gradually increase in humidity. Bentley, Serm.

2. That which contains any thing. This sense is perhaps only in Shakspeare, Dr. Johnson says.
But there is abundant and good authority for this usage of the word.

O cleave my sides!
Heart, once be stronger than thy continent,
Crack thy frail case. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.
Close pent-up guilts,
Rive your contending continent. Shakspeare, K. Lear.
I told our pilot that past other men
He most must bear firm spirits, since he sway'd
The continent that all our spirits convey'd.
Chapman, Odys. 12.

I did not say that the Book of Articles only was the con- tinent of the Church of England's publick doctrine.

The smaller continent which we call a pipkin.
Kennet, Paroch. Antiq. Gloss. in v. Potagnum.

CONTINE'NTAL.* adj. [from continent.] Respecting a continent; particularly relating to the states on the continent of Europe: a word much used in the politicks of modern times.

I must leave it to you—to reflect upon the effect of this or any continental alliances, present or future.
Burke on a Regicide Peace.

CO'NTINENTLY.* adv. [from continent.] Chastely.
When Paul wrote this epistle, it was lykely enough that the man would live continently.

Martin on the Marr. of Priests, (1554.) X. i.

To CONTINGE. v. n. [contingo, Lat.] To touch;
to reach: to happen. Dict.

CONTINGENCE.† } n. s. [from contingent.]

CONTINGENCY. }

1. The quality of being fortuitous; accidental possibility.
Their credulities assent unto any prognosticks, which, considering the contingency in events, are only in the prescience of God. Brown, Vulg. Err.

For once, O heaven! unfold thy adamant book;
If not thy firm, immutable decree,
At least the second page of great contingency,
Such as consists with wills originally free. Dryden.
It is a blind contingency of events? Dryden, Amphitryon.

CON

Aristotle says, we are not to build certain rules upon the contingency of human actions. South.

2. The act of reaching to, or touching.

From the time of the sun's being in F, the point of his rising, till he came to L, the point of contingency, the shadow of the style went still forward from S by Q to M.

Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 39.

CONTINGENT. † adj. [contingens, Lat.]

1. Falling out by chance; accidental; not determinable by any certain rule.

Hazard naturally implies in it, first, something future; secondly, something contingent. South.

I first informed myself in all material circumstances of it, in more places than one, that there might be nothing casual or contingent in any one of those circumstances. Woodward.

2. Dependent upon an uncertainty.

If a contingent legacy be left to any one when he attains, or if he attains, the age of twenty one, and he dies before that time, it is a lapsed legacy. Blackstone.

CONTINGENT. n. s.

1. A thing in the hands of chance.

By contingents we are to understand those things which come to pass without any human forecast. Grew, Cosmol.

His understanding could almost pierce into future contingents, his conjectures improving even to prophecy. South, Serm.

2. A proportion that falls to any person upon a division: thus, in time of war, each prince of Germany is to furnish his contingent of men, money, and munition.

CONTINGENTLY. adv. [from contingent.] Accidentally; without any settled rule.

It is digged out of the earth contingently, and indifferently, as the pyrite and agates. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONTINGENTNESS. n. s. [from contingent.] Accidentalness.

CONTINUAL. † adj. [continuel, old Fr. continuous, Latin.]

1. Incessant; proceeding without interruption; successive without any space of time between. Continual is used of time, and continuous of place, Dr. Johnson says; but formerly, I may observe, continual had the sense of continuous; as, "walls are either entire and continual, or intermitted," Wotton's Elem. of Architecture.

He that is of a merry heart, hath a continual feast.

Proverbs xv.

Other care perhaps

May have diverted from continual watch

Our great forbiddor.

Milton, P. L.

'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears.

Popo.

2. [In law.] A continual claim is made from time to time, within every year and day, to land or other thing, which, in some respect, we cannot attain without danger. For example, if I be disseised of land, into which, though I have right into it, I dare not enter, for fear of beating; it behooveth me to hold on my right of entry to the best opportunity of me and mine heir, by approaching as near it as I can, once every year as long as I live; and so I save the right of entry to my heir. Cowel.

3. It is sometimes used for perpetual.

CONTINUALLY. adv. [from continual.]

If truth be once perceived, we do thereby also perceive whatsoever is false in contradiction to it.

4. Contrariety, in thought or effect.

All contradictions grow in those minds, which, neither absolutely climb the rock of virtue, nor freely sink into the sea of vanity.

Laws human must be made without contradiction unto any positive law in scripture.

CONTRADICTIONAL.* adj. [from contradiction.] Inconsistent.

We have tried already, and miserably felt what ambition, worldly glory, and immoderate wealth can do; what the boisterous and contradictional hand of a temporal, earthly, and corporeal spirituality can avail to the edifying of Christ's holy church.

CONTRADICTIONOUS.† adj. [from contradict.]

1. Filled with contradictions; inconsistent.

And what might come to pass,
Implies no contradictionous inconsistencies.

If there were more supreme agents, their decrees must still be the more absurd and contradictionous to one another.

The rules of decency, of government, of justice itself, are so different in one place from what they are in another, so party-coloured and contradictionous, that one would think the species of men altered according to their climates.

2. Inclined to contradict; given to cavil.

Bondet was argumentative, contradictionous, and irascible.

3. Opposite to; inconsistent with.

Where the act is unmanly, and the expectation immoral, or contradictionous to the attributes of God, our hopes we ought never to entertain.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. V.

The soul of Christ contradistinguished from his body.

Ibid.

By flesh, or flesh and blood, especially when contradistinguished to the spirit, is commonly meant, not human nature simply considered; but human nature thus corrupted, or sinful flesh.

Wallis, Sermon at Oxf. 1682, p. 12.

Christ's active obedience they do contradistinguish to what they call negative justification, which they refer to the passive obedience of Christ.

Ibid. p. 15.

The primary ideas we have peculiar to body, as contradistinguished to spirit, are the cohesion of solid, and consequently separable parts, and a power of communicating motion by impulse.

Locke.

These are our complex ideas of soul and body, as contradistinguished.

Locke.

CONTRAFFISSURE. n. s. [from contra and fissure.]

Contusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the skull, either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, and then it is called fissure; or in the contrary part, in which case it obtains the name of contraffissure.

Wise man.

CONTRAINDICANT.* n. s. [contra and indicans, Lat. See To CONTRAINDICATE.] A symptom forbidding the usual treatment of the disorder.

Throughout it was full of contraindicants.

Burke.

To CONTRAINDICATE. v. a. [contra and indico, Lat.] To point out some peculiar or incidental symptom or method of cure, contrary to what the general tenour of the malady requires.

Vomits have their use in this malady; but the age and sex of the patient, or other urgent or contraindicating symptoms must be observed.

Harvey on Consumptions.

CONTRAINDICATION. n. s. [from contraindicate.] An indication or symptom, which forbids that to be done which the main scope of a disease points out at first.

Quincy.

I endeavour to give the most simple idea of the distemper, and the proper diet, abstracting from the complications of the first, or the contraindications to the second.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONTRAMURE. n. s. [contremur, French.] In fortification, is an out wall built about the main wall of a city.

Chambers.

CONTRARIETY. n. s. [from contra and nitens, Lat.] Reaction; a resistency against pressure.

Dict.

CONTRANATURAL.* adj. [contra and natural.] Opposite to nature; unnatural.

'Tis the perfection of every being to act according to the principle of its own nature; and it is the nature of an arbitrary principle to act or not, to do or undo, upon no account but its own will and pleasure: to be determined and tied up, either by itself, or from abroad, is violent and contranatural.
Ep. Rust, Disc. on Truth, § 6.

CONTRAPOSITION.† n. s. [from contra and position.]

A placing over against.

Many other things might here be alleged to shew how exact and exquisite an antithesis and contraposition there is between the apostles and cardinals.

Potter on the Numb. 656, p. 91.

If I have spoken more than needs concerning the opposition, or contraposition, of things in general, I have therefore done it, because I am fully persuaded, &c. Ibid. p. 122.

The extremities of which are no other than the last contraposition or opposition to God, in the state of death.

Cabalistical Dialogue, (1682,) p. 16.

CONTRAPUN'TIST.* n. s. [from the Ital. contrappunto, counterpoint, in musick, i. e. contra-point. See COUNTERPOINT.] One who is skilled in counterpoint.

Counterpoint is certainly so much an art, that to be, what they call, a learned contrapuntist, is with harmonists a title of no small excellence. Mason on Ch. Mus. p. 209.

CONTRAREGULARITY. n. s. [from contra and regularity.] Contrariety to rule.

It is not only its not promoting, but its opposing, or at least its natural aptness to oppose the greatest and best of ends; so that it is not so properly an irregularity as a contraregularity.
Norris.

CONTRARIANT.† adj. [contrariant, from contrarius, French.] Inconsistent; contradictory: a term of law, Dr. Johnson says; but it is also a general word, used by an admirable author, in the sense of opposite, repugnant. In its legal sense, it is also of much higher authority than Ayliffe, whom alone Dr. Johnson cites.

Such canons, &c. as be not contrariant nor repugnant to the laws, statutes, and customs of this realm.

Acts of Parl. 25 H. 8. c. 19.

The Christian religion contained precepts far more ungrateful and troublesome to flesh and blood, and contrariant to the general inclination of mankind.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. II.

The very depositions of witnesses themselves, being false, various, contrariant, single, inconcludent. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CO'NTRARIES. n. s. [from contrary.] In logick, propositions which destroy each other; but of which the falsehood of one does not establish the truth of the other.

If two universals differ in quality, they are contraries; as, every vine is a tree, no vine is a tree. These can never be both true together, but they may be both false. Watts, Logick.

CONTRARIETY. n. s. [from contrarietas, Latin.]

1. Repugnance; opposition.

The will about one and the same thing may, in contrary respects, have contrary inclinations, and that without contrariety.
Hooker.

Making a contrariety the place of my memory, in her foulness I beheld Patnola's fairness, still looking on Mopsa, but thinking on Pamela. Sidney.

He which will perfectly recover a sick and restore a diseased body unto health, must not endeavour so much to bring it to a state of simple contrariety, as of fit proportion in contrariety unto those evils which are to be cured. Hooker.

It principally failed by late setting out, and by some contrariety of weather at sea. Wotton.

Their religion had more than negative contrariety to virtue.

Decay of Piety.

There is a contrariety between those things that conscience inclines to, and those that entertain the senses. South.

These two interests it is to be feared, cannot be divided; but they will also prove opposite, and not resting in a bare diversity, quickly rise into a contrariety. South.

There is nothing more common than contrariety of opinions; nothing more obvious than that one man wholly disbelieves what another only doubts of, and a third stedfastly believes and firmly adheres to. Locke.

2. Inconsistency; quality or position destructive of its opposite.

He will be here, and yet he is not here;

How can these contraries agree? Shakspeare, Hen. II.

CONTRARILY. adv. [from contrary.]

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 109.

God of our fathers, what is man!

That Thou towards him, with hand so various,

Or might I say contrarious,

Temper'st thy providence through his short course?

Milton, S. A.

CONTRARIOUSLY. adv. [from contrarious.] Oppositely; contrarily.

Many things, having full reference

To one consent, may work contrariouly. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CO'NTRARIWISE. adv. [contrary and wise.]

1. Conversely.

Divers medicines in greater quantity move stool, and in smaller urine; and so, contrariwise, some in greater quantity move urine, and in smaller stool. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Every thing that acts upon the fluids, must, at the same time, act upon the solids, and contrariwise.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Oppositely.

The matter of faith is constant, the matter, contrariwise, of actions daily changeable. Hooker.

This request was never before made by any other lords; but, contrariwise, they were humble suitors to have the benefit and protection of the English laws. Davies on Ireland.

The sun may set and rise:

But we, contrariwise,

Sleep, after our short light,

One everlasting night.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

CONTRARY.† adj. [contrarius, Latin.] The accent on this word was formerly on the first or second syllable, as suited the convenience of our poets. Even Milton presents both accents. See Par. Lost, i. 161. Samson Agonist. 971. The word is still vulgarly pronounced with the accent on the second syllable.]

1. Opposite; contradictory; not simply different, or not alike, but repugnant, so that one destroys or obstructs the other.

Perhaps some thing, repugnant to her kind,

By strong antipathy the soul may kill;

But what can be contrary to the mind,

Which holds all contraries in concord still,

Davies.

2. Inconsistent; disagreeing.

He that believes it, and yet lives contrary to it, knows that he hath no reason for what he does. Tillotson.

The various and contrary choices that men make in the world, do not argue that they do not all pursue good; but that the same thing is not good to every man alike. Locke.

3. Adverse; in an opposite direction.

The ship was in the midst of the sea, tossed with the waves;
for the wind was contrary. St. Matt. xiv. 24.
By virtue of a clean contrary gale.

Habington's Castara, p. 116.

CO'NTRARY. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. A thing of opposite qualities.

No contraries hold more antipathy,

Than I and such a knave,

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

He sung

Why contraries bled thunder in the cloud. Cowley, Davideis.

Honour should be concern'd in honour's cause;

That is not to be en'd by contraries,

As bodies are, whose health is often drawn

From rankest poisons.

Southern's Orontoko.

2. A proposition contrary to some other; a fact contrary to the allegation.

The instances brought by our author are but slender proofs of a right to civil power and dominion in the first-born, and do rather shew the contrary. Locke.

3. On the CONTRARY. In opposition; on the other side.

He pleaded still not guilty:

The king's attorney, on the contrary,

Urg'd on examinations, proofs, confessions

Of diverse witnesses.

Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

If justice stood on the side of the single person, it ought to give good men pleasure to see that right should take place;
but when, on the contrary, the commonweal of a whole nation is overborn by private interest, what good man but must lament?

Swift.

1. To the CONTRARY. To a contrary purpose; to an opposite intent.

They did it not for want of instruction to the contrary.

Stillingfleet.

To CO'NTRARY.† v. a. [contrarius, French.] To oppose; to thwart: to contradict.

When I came to court I was advised not to contrary the king.

Latimer.

Finding in him the force of it, he would no further contrary it, but employ all his service to medicine it.

Sidney.

You must contrary me! marry, 'tis time.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

If they could have contraried him for any falsity.

Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 217.

CONTRARY-MINDED.* adj. [from contrary and mind.] Of a different opinion.

We are ready to impute to the contrary-minded not only those things which they profess to hold, but these which we conceive to be consequent to their opinions.

Bp. Hall, The Peacemaker.

CONTRAST.† n. s. [contraste, Fr.] Opposition and dissimilitude of figures, by which one contributes to the visibility or effect of another.

Longinus says, that Cecilius wrote of the sublime in a low way: on the contrary, Mr. Pope calls Longinus "the great sublime he draws." Let it be my ambition to imitate Longinus in style and sentiment; and, like Cecilius, to make these appear a contrast to my subject; to write of deformity with beauty; and by a finished piece to atone for an ill-turned person.

Hay, Essay on Deformity, p. 3.

Those umbrageous pines,

That frown in front, and give each azure hill

The charm of contrast.

Mason, English Garden.

To CO'NTRAST. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To place in opposition, so that one figure shews another to advantage.

2. To shew another figure to advantage by its colour or situation.

The figures of the groups must not be all on a side, that is, with their face and bodies all turned the same way; but must contrast each other by their several positions.

Dryden.

CONTRATENOR.* n. s. [from contra and tenor, in contradistinction to the tenor part; written also contratenor.] In musick, the middle part; higher than the tenor, and below the treble.

In his [Dr. Croft's] time there was a very fine contratenor in the Royal Chapel, called Elford, to whom, in the preface to his anthems, he gives great, and I suppose deserved applause, and for whose voice he purposely set several solos.

Mason on Church Musick, p. 136.

CONTRAVALLATION. n. s. [from contra and valla, Latin.] The fortification thrown up, by the besiegers, round a city, to hinder the sallies of the garrison.

When the late czar of Muscovy first acquainted himself with mathematical learning, he practised all the rules of circumvallation and contravallation at the siege of a town in Livonia.

Watts, Logick.

To CONTRAVENE.† v. a. [contra and venio, Lat.] To oppose; to obstruct; to baffle.

Laws, that place the subjects in such a state, contravene the first principles of the compact of authority: they exact obedience, and yield no protection.

Johnson, Journey to the West. Islands.

CONTRAVE'NER. n. s. [from contravene.] He who opposes another.

CONTRAVEN'TION.† n. s. [French.] Opposition. They shall voluntarily accept the condition and fulmination of the said censures, in case of contravention.

Ld. Herbert, Hist. of H. VIII. p. 191.

There may be holy contradictions, and humble contraventions, (as to God's silent providence, so to his declared will,) either discovered by effects, or by his express word.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 57.

If christianity did not lend its name to stand in the gap, and to employ or divert these humours, they must of necessity be spent in contraventions to the laws of the land.

Swift.

CONTRAVE'RSION.* n. s. [Lat. contra and versio.] A turning to the opposite side.

The second stanza was called the antistrophe from the contraversion of the chorus; the singers, in performing that, turning from the left hand to the right.

Congreve.

CONTRAVE'RSA.† n. s. [contra, against, and herba, a name by which the Spaniards call black hellebore; and, perhaps, sometimes poison in general.] A species of birthwort growing in Jamaica, where it is much used as an alexipharmick.

Miller.

No Indian is so savage, but that he knows the use of his tobacco and contraverea.

Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 51.

CONTRACTA'TION.† n. s. [contractatio, Latin.] A touching or handling.

Dict.

The greatest danger of all is, in the contractation and touching of their hands.

Ferrand's Love Melancholy, (1540,) p. 254.

CONTRI'BUTARY. adj. [from con and tributary.] Paying tribute to the same sovereign.

Thus we are engaged in the objects of geometry and arithmetic; yea, the whole mathematicks must be contributory, and to them all nature pays a subsidy.

Glaucilla, Scopsis.

To CONTRI'BUTE.† v. a. [contribuo, Latin.] Formerly accented on the first syllable.] To give to some common stock: to advance towards some common design.

Their several shares of woe

Must contribute to Philip's overthrow.

Mary, Edward III. (1635,) B. iii.

Yet scarce to contribute

Each orb a glimpse of light.

Milton, P. L. vii. 155.

England contributes much more than any other of the allies.

Addison on the War.

His master contributed a great sum of money to the Jesuits' church, which is not yet quite finished.

Addison on Italy.

To CONTRI'BUTE. v. n. To bear a part; to have a share in any act or effect.

Whatever praises may be given to works of judgement, there is not even a single beauty in them to which the invention must not contribute. Pope, Ess. on Homer.

CONTRIBUTER.* See CONTRIBUTOR.

CONTRIBUTION.† n. s. [old Fr. contribution.]

1. The act of promoting some design in conjunction with other persons.

2. That which is given by several hands for some common purpose.

It hath pleased them of Macedonia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints. Rom. xv. 26.

Parents owe their children not only material subsistence for their body, but much more spiritual contributions for their mind. Digby.

• Beggars are now maintained by voluntary contributions.

Graunt, Rills of Mortality.

3. That which is paid for the support of an army lying in a country.

The people 'twixt Philippi and this ground,

Do stand but in a forc'd affection;

For they have grudg'd us contribution. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

CONTRIBUTIVE.† adj. [from contribute.] That which has the power or quality of promoting any purpose in concurrence with other motives.

As the value of the promises renders them most proper incentives to virtue, so the manner of proposing we shall find also highly contributive to the same end. Decay of Piety.

In the matter of beauty, we challenge to ourselves something as contributive to handsomeness, which is not our's by a native, personal, and individual title.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 99.

CONTRIBUTOR.† n. s. [written contributor by Cotgrave; old Fr. contributeur.] One that bears a part in some common design; one that helps forward, or exerts his endeavours to some end, in conjunction with others.

I promis'd we would be contributors,

And bear his charge of wooing, whatso'er. Shakspeare.

A grand contributor to our dissensions is passion.

Decay of Piety.

Art thou a true lover of thy country? Zealous for its religious and civil liberties? And a cheerful contributor to all those publick expences which have been thought necessary to secure them?

Atterbury.

The whole people were witnesses to the building of the ark and tabernacle, they were all contributors to it. Forbes.

CONTRIBUTORY.† adj. [from contribute.] Promoting the same end; bringing assistance to some joint design, or increase to some common stock.

Like bonfires of contributory wood,

Every man's look shew'd, fed with others' spirit.

Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois.

TO CONTRISTATE.† v. a. [contristo, Lat.] To sadden; to make sorrowful; to make melancholy. Not now used.

Blackness and darkness are but privatives, and therefore have little or no activity: somewhat they do contristate, but very little. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Let me never more contristate thy Holy Spirit with these vanities. Spiritual Conquest, (1651,) P. i. p. 64.

CONTRISTATION.† n. s. [from contristate.] The act of making sad; the state of being made sad; sorrow; heaviness of heart; sadness; sorrowfulness; gloominess; grief; moan; mournfulness; trouble; discontent; melancholy. Not now used.

Incense and odorous smells, such as were of sacrifices, were thought to intoxicate the brain, and to dispose men to devotion; which they may do by a kind of sadness and contristation of the spirits, and partly also by heating and exalting them. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The Eastern traditioners mean by this a continual sadness and contristation of heart, which Adam had, and made, for the loss of Paradise. Gregory's Works, p. 123.

The husband, tender and pusillanimous, falleth into pangs of fears and contristation.

Robinson's Endow. of Sympathy, p. 41.

CONTRITE.† adj. [contritus, Lat.] This word formerly had the accent on either syllable; the example from Shakspeare presenting it on the first; that from Milton, on the last. It is now usually pronounced with the accent on the first.]

1. Bruised; much worn.

2. Worn with sorrow; harassed with the sense of guilt; penitent. In the books of divines contrite is sorrowful for sin, from the love of God and desire of pleasing him; and attrite is sorrowful for sin, from the fear of punishment.

I Richard's body have interred now;

And on it have bestow'd more contrite tears,

Than from it issu'd forced drops of blood.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

With tear,

Wat'ring the ground, and with our sighs the air

Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign

Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek. Milton, P. L.

The contrite sinner is restored to pardon, and, through faith in Christ, our repentance is intitled to salvation. Rogers.

CONTRITENESS. n. s. [from contrite.] Contrition; repentance. Dict.

CONTRITION. n. s. [from contrite.]

1. The act of grinding; or rubbing to powder.

Some of those coloured powders, which painters use, may have their colours a little changed, by being very elaborately and finely ground; where I see not what can be justly pretended for those changes, besides the breaking of their parts into less parts by that contrition. Newton, Opt.

2. Penitence; sorrow for sin: in the strict sense, the sorrow which arises from the desire to please God, distinguished from attrition, or imperfect repentance produced by dread of hell.

What is sorrow and contrition for sin? A being grieved with the conscience of sin, not only that we have thereby incurred such danger, but also that we have so unkindly grieved and provoked so good a God. Hammond, Pract. Cat.

Fruits of more pleasing savour, from thy seed

Sown with contrition in his heart, than those

Which, his own hand manuring, all the trees

Of paradise could have produc'd.

Milton, P. L.

Your fasting, contrition, and mortification, when the church and state appoints, and that especially in times of greater riot and luxury. Sprat, Sermon.

My future days shall be one whole contrition;

A chapel will I build with large endowment,

Where every day an hundred aged men

Shall all hold up their wither'd hands to heav'n. Dryden.

CONTRIVABLE. adj. [from contrive.] Possible to be planned by the mind; possible to be invented and adjusted.

It will hence appear how a perpetual motion may seem easily contrivable. Wilkins, Dædalus.

CONTRIVANCE. n. s. [from contrive.]

1. The act of contriving; excogitation; the thing contrived.

There is no work impossible to these contrivances, but there may be as much acted by this art as can be fancied by imagination. Wilkins, Math. Mag.

Instructed, you'll explore

Divine contrivance, and a God adore. Blackmore, Creation.

2. Scheme; plan; disposition of parts or causes.

Our bodies are made according to the most curious artifice, and orderly contrivance. Glanville, Scepis.

3. A conceit; a plot; an artifice.

Have I not manag'd my contrivance well,

To try your love, and make you doubt of mine? Dryden.

There might be a feint, a contrivance in the matter, to draw him into some secret ambush. Atterbury.

C O N

To CONTRIVE.† v. a. [controuer, Fr.]

1. To plan out; to excogitate.

One that slept in the contriving lust, and waked to do it.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

What more likely to contrive this admirable frame of the universe than infinite wisdom.

Tillotson.

Our poet has always some beautiful design, which he first establishes, and then contrives the means which will naturally conduct him to his end.

Dryden.

2. To wear away. Out of use. [Lat. contero, contrivi.]

Three ages, such as mortal men contrive.

Spenser, F. Q.

Please ye, we may contrive this afternoon,

And quaff carouses to our mistress' health.

Shakspeare, Tem. of the Shrew.

To CONTRIVE. v. n. To form or design; to plan; to scheme; to complot.

Is it enough

That masking habits and a borrowed name,

Contrive to hide my plenitude of shame?

Prior.

CONTRIVEMENT.† n. s. [from contrive.] Invention.

Dict.

The king being not only active to meet their contrivements, but had some advantage upon them.

Sir G. Buck, Hist. of Rich. III. p. 43.

To sit down and consider the admirable contrivement and artifice of this great fabrick of the universe.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 176.

CONTRIVER. n. s. [from contrive.] An inventor; one that plans a design; a schemer.

I, the mistress of your charms,

The close contriver of all harms,

Was never call'd to bear my part.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Egeus, who the fraud's contriver was.

Denham.

Plain loyalty, not built on hope,

I leave to your contriver, Pope:

None loves his king and country better,

Yet none was ever less their debtor.

Swift.

Scenes of blood and desolation, I had painted as the common effects of those destructive machines; whereof, he said, some evil genius, enemy to mankind, must have been the first contriver.

Swift, Gull. Trav.

CONTROL. n. s. [controle, that is, contre, role, French.]

1. A register or account kept by another officer, that each may be examined by the other.

2. Check; restraint.

Let partial spirits still aloud complain,

Think themselves injur'd that they cannot reign;

And own no liberty, but where they may,

Without control, upon their fellows prey.

Waller.

He shall feel a force upon himself from within, and from the control of his own principles, to engage him to do worthily.

South.

If the sinner shall win so complete a victory over his conscience, that all those considerations shall be able to strike no terror into his mind, lay no restraint upon his lusts, no control upon his appetites, he is certainly too strong for the means of grace.

South, Sermon.

Speak, what Phæbus has inspir'd thy soul

For common good, and speak without control.

Dryden, Homer.

3. Power; authority; superintendence.

The beasts, the fishes, and the winged fowls,

Are their male's subjects, and at their controls.

Shakspeare.

To CONTROL.† v. a. [from the noun, Dr. Johnson says; but it is from the old Fr. verb, contreroller. V. Cotgrave.]

1. To keep under check by a counter reckoning.

2. To govern; to restrain; to subject.

Authority to convent, to control, to punish, as far as with excommunication, whomsoever they think worthy.

Hooker, Pref.

C O N

Give me a staff of honour for mine

But not a sceptre to control the world.

Titus Andronicus.

Who shall control me for my works?

Eccles. v. 3.

I feel my virtue struggling in my soul;

But strong passion does its power control.

Dryden, Aurengz.

With this he did a herd of goats control;

Which by the way he met, and slyly stole;

Clad like country swain he pip'd and sung,

And playing drove his jolly troop along.

Dryden.

O, dearest Andrew, says the humble droll,

Henceforth may I obey, and thou control.

Prior.

3. To overpower; to confute: as, he controlled all the evidence of his adversary.

As for the time while he was in the Tower, and the manner of his brother's death, and his own escape, she knew they were things that a very few could control.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

CONTROLLABLE. adj. [from control.] Subject to control; subject to command; subject to be overruled.

Passion is the drunkenness of the mind, and therefore, in its present workings, not controllable by reason.

South.

CONTROLLER.† n. s. [old Fr. controleleur.] One that has the power of governing or restraining; a superintendent.

He does not calm his contumacious spirit,

Nor cease to be an arrogant controller.

Shakspeare, II. VI.

Shall the controller of proud Nemesis

In lawless rage upbraid each other's vice?

Bp. Hall, Sat. vi. 1.

They were driven to have their nomenclators, controllers, or remembrancers, to tell them the names of their servants and people about them, so many they were.

Hooker on Providence, p. 421.

The great controller of our fate,

Deign'd to be man, and liv'd in low estate.

Dryden.

CONTROLLERSHIP. n. s. [from controller.] The office of a controller.

CONTROLMENT.† n. s. [from control.]

1. The power or act of superintending or restraining.

It is an excellent thing to have a giant's strength; yet where it is, let it be so tempered, that law stoop not to every governor's humour and controlment.

Sir M. Sandys, Ess. (1634) p. 123.

2. The state of being restrained; restraint.

They made war and peace with one another, without controlment.

Davies on Ireland.

3. Opposition; confutation.

Were it reason that we should suffer the same to pass without controlment, in that current meaning whereby every where it prevaileth.

Hooker, iii. § 7.

4. Resistance; hostility.

Here have we war for war, and blood for blood,

Controlment for controlment.

Shakspeare, K. John.

CONTROVERSE.* n. s. [old Fr. controverse.]

Debate; controversy; dispute.

So fitly now here cometh next on place,

After the proofe of Prowesse ended well,

The controverse of Beautie's sovaine grace.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. v. 2.

For he the appeal of innocence derides,
And with his sword the controverse decides.

Sandys, Paraphr. of Job, p. 15.

Come, buckle on thy armour; let us end

This controverse, since thou wilt needs contend.

Ibid. p. 55.

The controverse of life and death

Is arbitrated by his breath.

Sandys, Ps. p. 106.

To CONTROVERSE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To dispute; to debate. See To CONTROVERT.

Persuasion ought to be fully settled in men's hearts that in litigations, and controverted causes of such quality, the Will of God is to have them to do whatsoever the sentence of judicial and final decision shall determine.

Hooker.

In exact discussing of all controverted questions.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

CONTROVER'SIAL. adj. [from controversy.] Relating to disputes; disputatious.

It happens in controversial discourses as it does in the assaulting of towns, where, if the ground be but firm whereon the batteries are erected, there is no farther enquiry whom it belongs to, so it affords but a fit rise for the present purpose.

CONTROVER'SIALIST. * n. s. [from controversial.] This is a modern word; and it is curious to observe, that heretofore it was controverser, controversor, and controvertter, and even controversy-writer; none of which have hitherto been noticed.] One who is engaged in literary war; a disputant.

The translators should be philologists, and not controversialists.

Abp. Newcome, Hist. View of Eng. Tr. of the Bible, p. 349.

In 1550 he [Robert Crowley] printed the first edition of Pierce Plowman's Vision, but with the ideas of a controversialist, and with the view of helping forward the reformation by the revival of a book which exposed the absurdities of popery in strong satire.

Warren, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 187.

Marcion, a rash and wild controversialist, published a recension, or chastised edition of St. Luke's Gospel.

Paley's View of the Evidence of Christianity, i. 9. § 7.

CONTROVERSER. * n. s. [Lat. controversus.] A disputant; a controvertist.

Thus saith the controverser.

Montagu, App. to Cæs. p. 91.

In which place, bolted before to the brain by many controversers, mine adversary hath learned of his Bellarmine to triumph above measure.

Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 29.

CONTROVERSY. n. s. [from controversia, Latin.]

1. Dispute; debate; agitation of contrary opinions: a dispute is commonly oral, and a controversy in writing.

How cometh it to pass that we are so rent with mutual contentions, and that the church is so much troubled? If men had been willing to learn, all these controversies might have died the very day they were first brought forth.

Hooker, b. 1.

Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. 1 Tim.

Wild controversy then, which long had slept,

Into the press from ruin'd cloisters leapt.

This left no room for controversy about the title, nor for encroachment on the right of others.

2. A suit in law.

If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgement, that the judges may judge them, then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked. Deut. xxv. 1.

3. A quarrel.

The Lord hath a controversy with the nations. Jer. xxv. 31.

4. Opposition; enmity. This is an unusual sense.

The torrent roar'd, and we did buffet it

With lusty sinews; throwing it aside,

And stemming it with hearts of controversy.

Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

CONTROVERSY-WRITER. * n. s. He who is now called a controversialist, or controvertist.

Their schoolmen, casuists, and controversy-writers have so mixed Aristotle's philosophy with their divinity.

Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 159.

TO CONTROVERT. † v. a. [from controverto, Lat.]

This verb, in our old dictionaries, is defined, to strive, to contend, or be at variance about a matter; not confining the meaning, as Dr. Johnson confines it, to literary dispute. Contraverse, which he had introduced under this word as perhaps intended for controvert, is a true word, and no mistake of Hooker's. See TO CONTRVERSE.] To debate; to ventilate in opposite books; to dispute any thing in writing.

If any person shall think fit to controvert them, he may do it very safely for me.

Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CO'NTROVERTER. * n. s. [from controvert.] A disputant; a controversialist.

Some controverters in divinity are like swaggerers in a tavern, that catch that which stands next them, the candlestick, or pots.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

On divinity

As controverters in vouch'd texts leave out

Shrewd words, which might against them clear the doubt.

Donne, Poems, p. 125.

CONTROVE'RTIBLE. adj. [from controvert.] Disputable; that may be the cause of controversy.

Discouring of matters dubious, and many controvertible truths, we cannot without arrogance intreat a credulity, or implore any farther assent than the probability of our reasons and verity of our experiments.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'NTROVERTIST. n. s. [from controvert.] Disputant, a man versed or engaged in literary wars or disputation.

Who can think himself so considerable as not to dread this mighty man of demonstration, this prince of controvertists, this great lord and possessor of first principles.

Tillotson.

CONTUMA'CIOUS. adj. [from contumacia, Latin.] Obstinate; perverse; stubborn; inflexible.

He is in law said to be a contumacious person, who, on his appearance afterwards, departs the court without leave.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

There is another very efficacious method for subduing of the most obstinate contumacious sinner, and bringing him into the obedience of the faith of Christ.

Hammond, Fundamentals.

CONTUMA'CIOUSLY. adv. [from contumacious.] Obstinate; stubbornly; inflexibly; perversely.

CONTUMA'CIOUSNESS. n. s. [from contumacious.] Obstinacy; perverseness; inflexibility; stubbornness.

From the description I have given of it, a judgement may be given of the difficulty and contumaciousness of cure.

Wiceman.

CONTUMACY. n. s. [from contumacia, Latin.]

1. Obstinacy; perverseness; stubbornness; inflexibility.

Such acts

Of contumacy will provoke the Highest

To make death in us live.

Milton, P. L.

2. [In law.] A wilful contempt and disobedience to any lawful summons or judicial order.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

These certificates do only, in the generality, mention the party's contumacies and disobedience.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONTUME'LIOUS. adj. [from contumeliosus, Latin.]

1. Reproachful; rude; sarcastick; contemptuous.

With scoffs and scorns, and contumelious taunts,

In open market-place produc'd they me

To be a publick spectacle.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

In all the quarrels and tumults at Rome, though the people frequently proceeded to rude contumelious language, yet no blood was ever drawn in any popular commotions, 'till the time of the Gracchi.

Swift.

2. Inclined to utter reproach or practise insults; brutal; rude.

There is yet another sort of contumelious persons, who, indeed, are not chargeable with that circumstance of ill employing their wit; for they use none in it.

Gov. of the Tongue.

Giving our holy virgins to the stain

Of contumelious, beastly, madbrain'd war.

Shakspeare, Timon.

3. Productive of reproach; shameful; ignominious.

As it is in the highest degree injurious to them, so is it contumelious to him.

Doddy of Piety.

CONTUME'LIOUSLY. adv. [from contumelious.] Reproachfully; contemptuously; rudely.

The people are not wont to take so great offence, when they are excluded from honours and offices, as when their persons are contumeliously trodden upon.

Hooker, i. § 10.

Die, lords; that you, being supreme magistrates,
Thus contumeliously should break the peace.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

CONTUMELIOUSNESS. n. s. [from contumelious.] Rudeness; reproach.

CONTUMELY. n. s. [contumelia, Latin.] Rudeness; contemptuousness; bitterness of language; reproach.

If the helm of chief government be in the hands of a few of the wealthiest, then laws, providing for continuance thereof, must make the punishment of contumely and wrong, offered unto any of the common sort, sharp and grievous, that so the evil may be prevented.

Hooker, l. § 10.

The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despis'd love, the law's delay. Shakespeare, Ham.
It was undervalued and depressed with some bitterness and contumely.

Clarendon.

Why should any man be troubled at the contumelies of those whose judgement deserves not to be valued?

Tillotson.

Eternal contumely attend that guilty title which claims exemption from thought, and arrogates to its wearers the prerogative of brutes.

Addison, Guardian.

To CONTU'ND.* v. a. [Lat. contundo.] This verb is in our old dictionaries, and is defined "to beat small in a mortar." It has a pedantick look and sound, and I find it used only by the annotator on Don Quixote. The word is now confuse. To bruise; to beat together.

His muscles were so extended and contunded that he was not corpus mobile.

Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iii. 2.

To CONTU'SE. v. a. [contusus, Latin.]

Dryden, Fab. Pref.

There was a pair of spectacles, a pocket perceptive, and several other little conveniences, I did not think myself bound in honour to discover.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

4. Fitness of time or place.

Use no farther means;

But with all brief and plain convenience,

Let me have judgement.

Shakespeare, Merch. of Ven.

CONVENIENT. adj. [conveniens, Lat.]

1. Fit; suitable; proper; well adapted; commodious.

The least and most trivial episodes, or under actions, are either necessary or convenient; either so necessary that without them the poem must be imperfect, or so convenient that no others can be imagined more suitable to the place in which they are.

Dryden, Ded. to the Æneid.

Health itself is but a kind of temper, gotten and preserved by a convenient mixture of contraries.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. It has either to or for before the following noun: perhaps it ought generally to have for before persons, and to before things.

CONVERSAZIONE.* n. s. [Ital. of late adopted in our fashionable language.] A meeting of company.

The diversions of a Florentine Lent are — in the evening, what is called a conversazione, a sort of assembly at the principal people's houses, full of I cannot tell what.

Gray, Lett. to his Mother, 1740.

These conversazioni [at Florence] resemble our card-assembly: — some played at cards, some passed the time in conversation, others walked from place to place.

Drummond's Travels, (1754,) p. 414

TO CONVERSE. v. n. [converser, Fr. conversor,
Latin.]

1. To cohabit with; to hold intercourse with: to be a companion to: followed by with.

By approving the sentiments of a person with whom he conversed, in such particulars as were just, he won him over from those points in which he was mistaken.

Adijson, Frecholder.

For him who lonely loves

To seek the distant hills, and there converse

With nature.

Thomson, Summer.

2. To be acquainted with; to be familiar to action.

I will converse with iron-witted fools,

And unrespective boys: none are for me,

That look into me with considerate eyes.

Shakespeare, K. John.

Nor would I be a convertite so cold,
As not to tell it. Donne, Poems, p. 188.

CONVEX. adj. [convexus, Lat.] Rising in a circular form; opposite to concave.

It is the duty of a painter, even in this also, to imitate the convex mirror, and to place nothing which glares at the border of his picture. Dryden, Duf.

An orb or ball round its own axis whirl;
Will not the motion to a distance hurl
Whatever dust or sand you on its place,
And drops of water, from its convex face? Blackmore, Creat.

CONVEX. n. s. [Formerly with the accent on the last syllable.] A convex body; a body swelling externally into a circular form.

Our prison strong, this huge convex of fire Outrageous to devour. Milton, P. L. ii. 434.
In circuit to the uttermost convex
Of this great round. Ibid. vii. 266.

A comet draws a long extended blaze;
From East to West burns through th' ethereal frame,
And half heaven's convex glitters with the flame. Tickel.

CONVEXED. part. adj. [from convex.] Formed convex; protuberant in a circular form.

Dolphins are straight; nor have they their spine convexed, or more considerably embowed than either sharks, porpoises, whales, or other cetaceous animals. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONVEXEDLY. adv. [from convexed.] In a convex form.

They be drawn convexedly crooked in one piece; yet the dolphin that carrieth Arion, is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONVEXITY. n. s. [from convex.] Protuberance in a circular form.

Convex glasses supply the defect of plumpness in the eye, and, by increasing the refraction, make the rays converge sooner, so as to convene distinctly at the bottom of the eye, if the glass have a due degree of convexity. Newton, Opt.

If the eye were so piercing as to descry even opaque and little objects a hundred leagues off, it would do us little service; it would be terminated by neighbouring hills and woods, or in the largest and evenest plain, by the very convexity of the earth. Bentley.

CONVEXLY. adv. [from convex.] In a convex form.

Almost all, both blunt and sharp, are convexly conical, they are all along convex, not only per ambitum, but between both ends. Green, Museum.

CONVEXNESS. n. s. [from convex.] Spheroidal protuberance; convexity.

CONVEXO-CONCAVE. adj. Having the hollow on the inside, corresponding to the external protuberance.

These are the phenomena of thick convexo-concave plates of glass, which are every where of the same thickness. Newton.

To CONVEY. v. a. [convocho, Latin.]

1. To carry; to transport from one place to another.
Let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over till I come into Judea. Neh. ii. 7.

I will convey them by sea in floats, unto the place thou shalt appoint me. 1 Kings, v. 9.

2. To hand from one to another.

C O N

A divine natural right could not be conveyed down, without any plain, natural, or divine rule concerning it. Locke.

3. To remove secretly.

There was one conveyed out of my house yesterday in this basket. Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

4. To bring any thing, as an instrument of transmission; to transmit.

Since there appears not to be any ideas in the mind, before the senses have conveyed any in, I conceive that ideas in the understanding are coeval with sensation. Locke.

5. To transfer; to deliver to another.

The earl of Desmond, before his breaking forth into rebellion, conveyed secretly all his lands to friends in trust. Spenser on Ireland.

Adam's property or private dominion could not convey any sovereignty or rule to his heir, who, not having a right to inherit all his father's possessions, could not thereby come to have any sovereignty over his brethren. Locke.

6. To impart by means of something.

Men fill one another's heads with noise and sounds, but convey not thereby their thoughts. Locke.

That which uses to produce the idea, though conveyed in by the usual organ, not being taken notice of, there follows no sensation. Locke.

Some single imperceptible bodies must come from them to the eyes, and thereby convey to the brain some motion which produces those ideas. Locke.

They give energy to our expressions, and convey our thoughts in more ardent and intense phrases than any in our own tongue. Addison, Spect. No. 405.

7. To impart; to introduce.

What obscured light the heavens did grant,
Did but convey unto our fearful minds
A doubtful warrant of immediate death.
Shakespeare, Com. of Err.

Others convey themselves into the mind by more senses than one. Locke.

8. To manage with privacy.

I will convey the business as I shall find means, and acquaint you withal. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Hugh Capet also who usurp'd the crown,
To fine his title with some shews of truth
Convey'd himself as heir to the Lady Lengare. Shakespeare.

To CONVEY.* v. n. To play the thief; to have the habit of thieving. From this old and cant acceptance of the word comes the modern conveyance for artifice. See the 8th sense of CONVEYANCE, and the 3d of CONVEYER.

Syr, the horsesones could not convey elene.

Old Morality of Hycke-Scorner.

Nym. The good humour is to steal at a minute's rest.

Pist. Convey, the wise it call: steal? lo! a fico for the phrase. Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

CONVEYANCE. n. s. [from convey.]

1. The act of removing any thing.

Tell her thou mad'st away her uncle Clarence,
Her uncle Rivers; ay, and for her sake,

2. Way for carriage or transportation.

Following the river downward, there is conveyance unto the countries named in the text. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.
Iron works ought to be confined to places where there is no conveyance for timber to places of vent, so as to quit the cost of the carriage. Temple.

3. The method of removing secretly from one place to another.

Your husband's here at hand; bethink you of some conveyance; in the house you cannot hide him. Shakespeare.

4. The means or instrument by which any thing is conveyed.

We put upon the morning, are unapt
To give or to forgive; but when we've

'Stuff'd these pipes, and these conveyances of blood,
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

How such a variety of motions should be regularly conducted in such a wilderness of passages and distinct avenues by mere impellents and material conveyances, I have not the least conjecture.

Glasville, San. Dog.

5. Transmission; delivery from one to another.

Our author has provided for the descending and conveyance down of Adam's monarchical power, or paternal dominion, to posterity.

Locke.

6. Act of transferring property; grant.

Doth not the act of the parents, in any lawful grant or conveyance, bind their heirs for ever thereunto?

Spenser on Ireland.

7. Writing by which property is transferred.

The very conveyances of his lands will hardly lie in this box; and must the inheritor himself have no more?

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

This begot a suit in the chancery before the lord Coventry, who found the conveyances in law to be so firm, that in justice he must decree the land to the earl.

Clarendon.

8. Secret management; juggling artifice; private removal; secret substitution of one thing for another.

It cometh herein to pass with men, unadvisedly fallen into error, as with them whose state hath no ground to uphold it, but only the help which, by subtle conveyance, they draw out of casual events, arising from day to day, till at length they be clean spent.

Hooker, iii. § 4.

Close conveyance, and each practice ill

Of cosinage and knavery.

Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

I am this day come to survey the Tower;

Since Henry's death, I fear, there is conveyance

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Can they not juggle, and with slight,

Conveyance play with wrong and right.

Hudibras.

CONVEYANCER.† n. s. [from conveyance.] A lawyer who draws writings by which property is transferred.

The Conquerour reduced all grants to writing, to signature, and to witnesses; which brought in evils and actions grounded upon punctilious errors in writing, mistakes in expression, which in writing, must sometimes happen either by haste, weakness, or perhaps by fraud of conveyancers.

Temple, Introd. Hist. of England.

CONVEYER.† n. s. [from convey.]

1. One who carries or transmits any thing from one place or person to another.

The conveyers of waters of these times content themselves with one inch of fall in six hundred feet.

Brevint on Lang.

Those who stand before earthly princes, in the nearest degree of approach, who are the dispensers of their favours, and conveyers of their will to others, do, on that very account, challenge high honours to themselves.

Atterbury.

2. That by which any thing is conveyed.

Melon seeds [are prescribed] with whey of goat's milk, which is the common conveyer.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 403.

Throughout the whole body it [the cavity of the spine] lieth lower, and deeper, and safer than the veins, or arteries, or any other common conveyers in the body of man.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 209.

This would be highly injurious to the great Artificer and Maker of those bodies, that he should provide such store-houses of mischief, such irresistible conveyers of the seeds of sin into men's minds.

South, Sermon. viii. 92.

3. A juggler; an imposter; a thief.

Frequent your exercises, a horse on your thumb,

A quick eye, a sharp knife, at hand a receiver;

But then take heed, cousin, ye be a cleanly conveyer.

Preston, Trag. of Cambises, (about 1561.)

Bol. Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.

K. Rich. O, good! convey? — Conveyers are you all,

That rise thus nimbly by a true king's fall.

Shakspeare, Rich. II.

CONVICINITY.* n. s. [Lat. con and vicinus.] Nearness; neighbourhood.

The bishop having first stated the convicinity and contiguity of the two parishes.

Warton, Hist. of Kildington, p. 18.

To CONVICT.† v. a. [convinco, convictum, Lat.]

1. To prove guilty; to detect in guilt.

And they which heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one.

John, viii. 9.

Things, that at the first shew seemed possible, by ripping up the performance of them, have been convicted of impossibility.

Bacon, Holy War.

2. To confute; to discover to be false.

Although not only the reason of any head, but experience of every hand, may well convict it, yet will it not by divers be rejected.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. To shew by proof or evidence.

If there be no such thing apparent upon record, they do as if one should demand a legacy by virtue of some written testament, wherein there being no such thing specified, he pleadeth that there it must needs be, and bringeth arguments from the love which always the testator bore him, imagining that these proofs will convict a testament to have that in it which other men can no where by reading find.

Hooker.

4. To destroy; to overpower; to surmount.

Not now in use; but formerly employed for convince, as our old lexicography shews. V. Minshew in V. CONVICT. In the following genuine passage of our great poet, Pope altered convicted to collected; and Dr. Johnson, not attending to this sense of the word, adopted the sophisticated reading in citing the passage for an illustration of armado, which I have removed.

So, by a roaring tempest on the flood,

A whole armado of convicted sail,

Is scatter'd and disjoin'd from fellowship.

Shakspeare, K. John.

CONVICT. adj. [rather the participle of the verb.]

Convicted; detected in guilt.

Before I be convict by course of law,

To threaten me with death is most unlawful.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

By the civil law a person convict, or confessing his own crime, cannot appeal.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

Convict a papist he, and I a poet.

Pope, Epist. of Hor.

CONVICIT. n. s. [from the verb.] A person cast at the bar; one found guilty of the crime charged against him; a criminal detected at his trial.

On the score of humanity, the civil law allows a certain space of time both to the convict and to persons confessing, in order to satisfy the judgement.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONVICTION. n. s. [from convict.]

1. Detection of guilt, which is, in law, either when a man is outlawed, or appears and confesses, or else is found guilty by the inquest.

Cowel.

The third best absent is condemn'd,

Convict by flight, and rebel to all law,

Conviction to the serpent none belongs.

Milton, P. L.

2. The act of convincing; confutation; the act of forcing others, by argument, to allow a position.

When therefore the apostle requireth ability to convict hereticks, can we think he judgeth it a thing unlawful, and not rather needful, to use the principal instrument of their conviction, the light of reason.

Hooker, iii. § 8.

The manner of his conviction was designed, not as a peculiar privilege to him; but as a standing miracle, a lasting argument, for the conviction of others, to the very end of the world.

Atterbury.

3. State of being convinced.

Their wisdom is only of this world, to put false colours upon things, to call good evil, and evil good, against the conviction of their own consciences.

Swift.

CONVICTIVE.† adj. [from convict.] Having the power of convincing.

In those convictive wonders, O Saviour, which thou wroughtest upon earth.

Bp. Hall, Gr. Myst. of Godliness, § 7.

They would then have been thought to assert it with clear and convictive evidence. Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 87.
It deserves an entire treatise apart by itself, and that girt up in the most close and convictive method that may be.

More, Antid. ag. Idolatry, Pref.

CONVICTIVELY.* adv. [from convictive.] In a convincing manner.

The truth of the Gospel had clearly shined in the simplicity thereof, and so convictively against all the follies and impostures of the former ages. More, Expos. Seven Ch. p. 141.

TO CONVINCe.† v. a. [convinco, Latin.]

1. To force any one to acknowledge a contested position.

That which I have all this while been endeavouring to convince men of, and to persuade them to, is no other but what God himself doth particularly recommend to us, as proper for human consideration. Tillotson.

But having shifted every form to 'scape,
Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape. Dryden, Virg.
History is all the light we have in many cases, and we receive from it a great part of the useful truths we have, with a convincing evidence. Locke.

2. To convict; to prove guilty of.

To convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds. Jude, 15.

The discovery of a truth, formerly unknown, doth rather convince man of ignorance, than nature of error. Raleigh.

Should he for wear't, make all the affidavits
Against it, that he could, afore the bench
And twenty juries, he would be convinc'd.

B. Jonson, Staple of News.

O look not to convince me of a crime,
Which I can ne'er repent, nor can you pardon. Dryden.

3. To evince: to prove; to manifest; to vindicate. Not in use.

Totò Italy contains none so accomplished a courtier, to convince the honour of my mistress. Shakspeare, Cym.

This letter, instead of a confutation, only urgeth me to prove divers passages of my sermon, which M. Cheynel's part was to convince. Dr. Mann.

4. To overpower; to surmount. This sense is obsolete, Dr. Johnson says, citing only Shakspeare. Dryden, however, uses it.

There are a crew of wretched souls
That stay his cure; their malady convinces
The great assay of art. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Knave, be such abroad,
Who having, by their own importunate suit,
Or voluntary dotage of some mistress,
Convinc'd or suppled them, they cannot chuse
But they must blab. Shakspeare, Othello.

When Duncan is asleep, his two chamberlains
Will I, with wine and wassel, so convince,
That memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

But strait I convinc'd all his fear with a smile.
Dryden, F. n. Love.

CONVINCEMENT.† n. s. [from convince.] Conviction.

They taught compulsion without convincement, which not long before they complained of as executed unchristianly against themselves. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. iii.

Others—love not to wade further into the fear of a convincement. Milton, Tetrachordon.

If that be not convincement enough, let him weigh the other also. Decay of Piety.

CONVINCEER.* n. s. [from convince.] That which makes manifest.

The divine light now was only a convincer of his miscarriages, but administered nothing of the divine love and power, as it does to them that are obedient, and sincere followers of its precepts; and therefore Adam could no more endure the presence of it, than sore eyes the sun or candlelight.

More, Conj. Cabb. (1653,) p. 232.

CONVINCIble. adj. [from convince.]

1. Capable of conviction.

2. Capable of being evidently disproved, or detected.

Upon what uncertainties, and also convincible falsities, they often erected such emblems, we have delivered. Brown.

CONVINCEINGLY.† adv. [from convince.] In such a manner as to leave no room for doubt or dispute; so as to produce conviction.

How convincingly, O Saviour, wert thou justified in the spirit by the dreadful and miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost in the cloven and fiery tongues, and that sudden variety of language for the spreading of the glory of thy name over all the nations of the earth!

Bp. Hall, Great Mystery of Godliness.

This he did so particularly and convincingly, that those of the parliament were in great confusion. Clarendon.

The third sort of providences, in which God often speaks convincingly, is by signal unexpected deliverances.

Soth, Scap. ix. p. 52.

The resurrection is so convincingly attested by such persons with such circumstances, that they who consider and weigh the testimony, at what distance soever they are placed, cannot entertain any more doubt of the resurrection than the crucifixion of Jesus. Atterbury.

CONVINCEINGNESS. n. s. [from convincing.] The power of convincing.

CONVICTIOUS.* adj. [from the Lat. convictor, or convictor, to taunt.] Reproachful.

The Queen's majesty—communioneth all manner her subjects to forbear all vain and contentious disputations in matters of religion, and not to use in dispute or rebuke of any person these convictious words, papist, or papistical, heretike, scismaticke, or sacramentarie, or any such like words of reproche. Q. Eliz. Injunctions, &c. 1559.

TO CONVIVE.† v. n. [convivo, Latin.] To entertain; to feast. A word, I believe, not elsewhere used, Dr. Johnson says. But Mr. Stevens asserts that it is used in the Hist. of Helias, Knight of the Swanne. This verb, which Dr. Johnson has made active by inaccurately printing you for we, as Mr. Mason also has observed, is neuter.

First, all you peers of Greece, go to my tent,
There in the full convive we. Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

CONVIVAL.† adj. [convivialis, Latin.] Relating to an entertainment; festal; social.

In their convivial garland they had respect unto plants preventing drunkenness, or discouraging the exhalation from wine. Ser P. Broun, Misc. Tracts, p. 91.

I was the first who set up festivals;
Not with high taste our appetites did force,
But fill'd with conversation and discourse;
Which feasts, convivial meetings we did name. Dionant.

Your social and convivial spirit is such that it is a happiness to live and converse with you. Dr. Newton.

CONVIVREUM. n. s. A low jest; a quibble; a mean conceit; a cant word.

Mean time be mows, and laughs at merry tale,
Or pun ambiguous, or convivrium quaint. Philips.

TO CONVOCATE.† v. a. [convoco, Lat.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

Then both the consuls, at the utmost day
Of their expiring honour, convocate
To Epire the fled father. May's Lucan, B. 5.

Smyrna or Aegora, where trade hath convocated great numbers of the Armenian nation.

Ricant, Greek Church, p. 392.

CONVOCA'TION.† n. s. [convocatio, Latin.]

1. The act of calling to an assembly.

Diaphantus making a general convocation, spake to them in this manner. Silvius.

2. An assembly.

On the eighth day shall be an holy convocation unto you.

Lev. xxiii. 20.

3. An assembly of the clergy for consultation upon matters ecclesiastical, in time of parliament; and as the parliament consists of two distinct houses, so does this; the one called the upper house, where the archbishops and bishops sit severally by themselves; the other the lower house, where all the rest of the clergy are represented by their deputies.

Cowel.

I have made an offer to his majesty,

Upon our spiritual convocation,

As touching France, to give a greater sum

Then ever at one time the clergy yet

Did to his predecessors part withal. Shakspeare, Henry IV.

This is the declaration of our church about it, made by those who met in convocation.

Stillington.

4. A distinct academical assembly, in which the general business of the university is transacted, sometimes called the great congregation, as consisting both of regents and non-regents; the congregation, so called, consisting only of the former. See CONGREGATION, and REGENT.

At the last time it [the reformation of the statutes of the university] was attempted, I was named in convocation one of the delegates myself. Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Chanc. of Oxford, p. 7.

To CONVOKE.† v. a. [convoco, Latin.] To call together; to summon to an assembly.

The queen of Italy, — having convoked all her princes, she exhorted them to leave all vain ostentations, and spongy vauntings unto the Spaniards.

Tr. of Boccalini, (1626.) p. 84.

Assemblies exercise their legislature at the times that their constitution, or their own adjournment appoints, if there be no other way prescribed to convoke them.

Locke.

When next the morning warms the purple East,

— convoke the peerage.

Pope, Odyssey.

The senate originally consisted all of nobles, the people being only convoked upon such occasions as fell into their cognizance.

Swift.

To CONVOLVE.† v. a. [convolvere, Latin.] To roll together; to roll one part upon another.

He writh'd him to and fro convolv'd.

Milton, P. L.

It is a wonderful artifice how newly hatched maggots, not the parent animal, because she emits no web, nor hath any textile art, can convolve the stubborn leaf, and bind it with the thread it weaves from its body.

Derham.

Us'd to milder scents, the tender race

By thousands tumble from their honey'd domes,

Convolve'd and agonizing in the dust.

Thomson, Autumn.

CONVOLUTED. part. [of the verb I have found no example.] Twisted; rolled upon itself.

This differs from Muscovy-glass only in this, that the plates of that are flat and plain, whereas these are convoluted and inflected.

Woodward on Fossils.

CONVOLUTION. n. s. [convolutio, Latin.]

1. The act of rolling any thing upon itself; the state of being rolled upon itself.

Observe the convolution of the said fibres in all other glands, in the same or some other manner.

Grew, Cosmol.

A thousand secret, subtle pipes bestow,

From which, by numerous convolutions wound,

Wrap'd with attending nerve, and twisted round.

Blackmore.

2. The state of rolling together in company.

And toss'd wide round,

O'er the calm sky in convolution swift,

The feather'd eddy floats.

Thomson, Autumn.

To CONVOY.† v. a. [convoyer, Fr. from conviare, low Latin.] To accompany by land or sea for the sake of defence: as, he was convoyed by ships of war. Milton places the accent on the last syllable: but the word is now usually spoken with the accent on the first.

Forth rush'd with whirlwind sound

The chariot of Paternal Deity,

Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,

Itself instinct with Spirit, but convoy'd

By four Cherubick shapes.

Milton, P. L. vi. 752.

I shall likewise assay those wily arbitresses who in most men have, as was heard, the sole ushering of truth and falsehood between the sense, and the soul, with what loyalty they will use me in convoying this truth to my understanding.

Milton, Reason of Church Government, ii. 3.

CONVOY. n. s. [from the verb. Anciently the accent was on the last syllable; it is now on the first.]

1. Force attending on the road by way of defence.

Had not God set peculiar value upon his temple, he would not have made himself his people's convoy to secure them in their passage to it.

South, Sermons.

My soul grows hard, and cannot death endure,

Your convoy makes the dangerous way secure.

Dryden, Aureng.

Convoy'ships accompany their merchants till they may prosecute the voyage without danger.

Dryden, Pref. Dufresnoy.

2. The act of attending as a defence.

Such fellows will learn you by rote where services were done; at such a breach, at such a convoy.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Swift, as a sparkle of a glancing star,

I shoot from heav'n to give him safe convoy.

Milton, Comus.

3. Conveyance. Not now in use.

Sister, as the winds give benefit,

And convoy is assistant, do not sleep,

But let me hear from you.

Shakspeare

CONVOLFULUS.* n. s. [Lat.] In botany, a genus of plants; bind-weed.

CONUSABLE.* adj. [from conusance.] Liable to be tried or judged.

He is a judge of one of those courts, where matrimonial causes are conusable.

Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 365.

CONUSANCE. n. s. [connaissance, French.] Cognizance; notice; knowledge. A law term.

CONUSANT.* adj. [from conusance.] Knowing.

It is not reasonable to suppose, the officer should be conusant of the formalities of law.

Italc, Hist. Pl. Cr. ch. 50.

To CONVULSE.† v. a. [convulsus, Latin.] To give an irregular and involuntary motion to the parts of any body.

A young man, who was strangely convulsed in his body, having sometimes one member and sometimes another, violently agitated.

Hallywell, Melanproneca, (1681.) p. 78.

Follows the loosen'd, aggravated roar,

Enlarging, deepening, mingling, peal on peal,

Crush'd horrible, convulsing heaven and earth.

Thomson.

CONVULSION. n. s. [convulsio, Latin.]

1. A convulsion is an involuntary contraction of the fibres and muscles, whereby the body and limbs are preternaturally distorted.

Quincy.

If my hand, he put into motion by a convulsion, the indifferency of that operative faculty is taken away.

Locke.

2. Any irregular and violent motion; tumult; commotion; disturbance.

All have been subject to some convulsions, and fallen under the same convulsions of state, by dissensions or invasions.

Temple.

CONVULSIVE. adj. [convulsif, French.] That which produces involuntary motion; that which gives twitches or spasms.

They are irregular and convulsive motions, or strugglings of the spirits.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Shew me the flying soul's convulsive strife,

And all the anguish of departing life.

Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,

And hoarse groans from her deep spirit came:

Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd

Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her lab'ring breast.

Dryden.

In silence weep,

And thy convulsive sorrows inward keep.

Prior.

CONVULSIVELY.* adv. [from convulsive.] In an agitated or tumultuous manner.

CONY.* n. s. [kanin, Germ. caning, Welsh; coinus, coinus, old Fr. coniculus, Latin.]

1. A rabbit; an animal that burrows in the ground.

With a short-legg'd hen,
Lemons and wine for sauce; to these a cony
Is not to be despair'd of, for our money. . . B. Jonson, Epig.
The husbandman suffers by hares and conys, which eat the corn trees. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. A simpleton. See TO CONY-CATCH.

• It [a cony or rabbit] is of itself a very conny, a most simple animal; whence are derived our usual phrases of conny and conny-catching. Dick's Dry Dinner, 1599.

CONY-BOROUGH.* n. s. A place where rabbits make their holes in the ground.

Birgh, or beorgh, now bergh, properly signifying to shroud or hide; which may also appear by our calling, in some parts of England, the places made for conies to hide and shroud themselves in cony-beries, or cony-buries; and in other parts of England, cony-burrows. Verstegan, Best of Dec. Intellig. ch. 7.

TO CONY-CATCH.* v. n. To catch a cony, is, in the old cant of thieves, to cheat; to bite; to trick; to deceive a foolish fellow. See the second sense of CONY.

I have matter in my head against you, and against your cony-catching rascals. Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

CONY-CATCHER. n. s. A thief; a cheat; a sharper; a tricking fellow; a rascal. Now obsolete.

TO COO. v. n. [from the sound.] To cry as a dove or pigeon.

The stock-dove only through the forest cooes, Mournfully hoarse. Thomson, Summer.

CO'ING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Invitation, as the note of the dove.

Let not the cooings of the world allure thee:
Which of her lovers ever found her true? Young, Night Th. 8.

COOK.* n. s. [old Fr. keux, from coquus, Latin.] One whose profession is to dress and prepare victuals for the table.

One mistress Quickly, is in the manner of his nurse, or his dry-nurse, or his cook, or his laundry, his washer, and his wringer. Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

The new-born babe, by nurses overlait,
And the cook caught within the raging fire he made Dryden.

Their cooks could make artificial birds and fishes, in default of the real ones, and which exceeded them in the exquisiteness of the taste. Arbuthnot on Coms.

COOK-MAID. n. s. [cook and maid.] A maid that dresses provisions.

A friend was complaining to me, that his wife had turned off one of the best cook-maids in England. Addison.

COOK-ROOM. n. s. [cook and room.] A room in which provisions are prepared for the ship's crew. The kitchen of a ship.

The commodity of this new cook-room, the merchants having found to be so great as that in all their ships the cook-rooms are built in their fore-castles, contrary to that which had been anciently used. Raleigh, Essays.

TO COOK. v. a. [coquo, Latin.]

1. To prepare victuals for the table.

Had either of the crimes been cooked to their palates, they might have changed messes. Decay of Piety.

2. To prepare for any purpose.

Hanging is the word, Sir; if you be ready for that, you are well cooked. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

TO COOK, or COOK.* v. n. [from the sound.] To make the noise of the cuckoo. It is also found in the Scottish poem of The Cherrie and Slae: "The cuckow cooks."

Let constant cuckows cook on every side.

The Silkwormes, 1599.

TO COOK.* v. a. [perhaps from chuck.] To throw. Cook me that ball. Gloucestershire. Grose.

COO'KERY. n. s. [from cook.] The art of dressing victuals.

Some man's wit
Found th' art of coo'kery to delight his sense:
More bodies are consum'd and kill'd with it,
Than with the sword, famine, or pestilence. Davies.

Ev'ry one to coo'kery pretends.
These are the ingredients of plants before they are prepared by coo'kery. King's Cookery.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

COOL.* adj. [Sax. col; Dutch, koel; Germ. kühl. See COLO.]

1. Somewhat cold; approaching to cold.

He set his leg in a pale-full, as hot as he could well endure it, renewing it as it grew cool. Temple.

2. Not zealous; not ardent; not angry; not fond; without passion: as, a cool friend; a cool deceiver.

A man of understanding is of an excellent spirit, [in the margin, of a cool spirit.] Prov. xvii. 27.

COOL. n. s. Freedom from heat; soft and refreshing coldness.

But see where Lucia, at her wonted hour,
Amid the cool of yon high marble arch,
Enjoys the noon day breeze. Addison, Cato.

Philander was enjoying the cool of the morning, among the dews that lay on every thing about him, and that gave the air a freshness. Addison on Medals.

TO COOL.* v. a. [koelen, Dutch; colan, Sax. coled, cooled.]

1. To make cool; to allay heat.

Father Abraham, have mercy on me; and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue; for I am tormented in this flame. St. Luke, xvi. 24.

Snow they use in Naples instead of ice, because, as they say, it cools or congeals any liquor sooner. Addison on Italy.

Jelly of currants, or the jelly of any ripe subacid fruit, is cooling, and very agreeable to the stomach. Arbuthnot on Diet.

2. To quiet passion; to calm anger; to moderate zeal.

My lord Northumberland will soon be cool'd.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He will keep his jealousy to himself, and repine in private, because he will be apt to fear some ill effect it may produce in cooling your love to him. Addison, Spect.

Had they thought they had been fighting only other people's quarrels, perhaps it might have cooled their zeal. Swift.

3. To cool the heels; a vulgarism, denoting to keep in attendance; not yet disused.

I looked through the keyhole, and saw him knocking at the gate; and I had the conscience to let him cool his heels there. Dryden, Amphitryon.

TO COOL.* v. n.

1. To grow less hot.

Come, who is next? our liquor here cools.
B. Jonson, Entert. at Highgate.

2. To grow less warm with regard to passion or inclination.

My humour shall not cool; I will incense Ford to deal with poison, I will possess him with yellowness. Shakspeare.

You never cool while you read Homer. Dryden.

I'm impatient till it be done; I will not give myself liberty to think, lest I should cool. Colgrave, Old Bachelor.

COOL-CUP.* A beverage, so called, usually composed of wine, water, lemon-peel, sugar, and borage; and introduced at tables in warm weather.

COOL-HEADED.* adj. [from cool and head.] Without passion. See the second sense of COOL.

The old, cool-headed, general law, is as good as any deviation dictated by present heat. Burke, Lett. to the Sher. of Bristol.

COOLER.* n. s. [from cool.]

1. That which has the power of cooling the body.

Coolers are of two sorts; first, those which produce an immediate sense of cold, which are such as have their parts in less motion than those of the organs of feeling; and secondly, such as, by particular viscosity, or grossness of parts, give greater consistence to the animal fluids than they had before, whereby they cannot move so fast, and therefore will have less of that intestine force on which their heat depends. The former are fruits, all acid liquors, and common water; and the latter are such as cucumbers, and all substances producing viscosity.

Quincy.

In dogs or cats there appeared the same necessity for a cooler as in man. Harvey on Consumptions.

Acid things were used only as coolers. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A vessel in which any thing is made cool. [This word is properly cowler; from cowle, a cowl or cowl, that is, a tub. See COWLSTAFF.]

Your first wort being thus boiled, lade off into one or more coolers, or cool-backs, in which leave the sillage behind, and let it run off fine. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CO'OLISH. * adj. [from cool.] Approaching to cold.

Looking as wise as possible, I observed, that the nights began to grow a little coolish at this time of the year.

Goldsmith, Ess.

CO'OLLY. adv. [from cool.]

1. Without heat, or sharp cold.

She in the gelid caverns, woodbine wrought,
And fresh bedew'd with ever-spouting streams,
Sits coolly calm. Thomson, Summer.

2. Without passion.

Motives that address themselves coolly to our reason, are fittest to be employed upon reasonable creatures. Atterbury.

CO'OLNESS. * n. s. [Sax. coelneþ.]

1. Gentle cold; a soft or mild degree of cold.

This difference consisteth not in the heat or coolness of spirits; for cloves, and other spices, naptha and petroleum, have exceeding hot spirits, hotter, a great deal than oil, wax, or tallow, but not inflamed. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The toad loveth shade and coolness. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Yonder the harvest of cold months laid up,

Gives a fresh coolness to the royal cup;

There ice, like crystal, firm and never lost,

Temper hot July with December's frost.

The sheep enjoy the coolness of the shade. Waller.

2. Want of affection; disinclination.

They parted with such coolness towards each other, as if they scarce hoped to meet again. Clarendon.

3. Freedom from passion.

There is that coolness and curiousness in a verse, which speaks it greatly unsuitable to the vehemence and seriousness of the prophetick spirit.

Spencer, Vanity of Vulg. Prophecies, p. 53.

COOM. n. s. [ecume, French.]

1. Soot that gathers over an oven's mouth. Phillips.

2. That matter that works out of the wheels of carriages. Bailey.

3. It is used in Scotland for the useless dust which falls from large coals.

COOMB, or COMB. n. s. [comble, Fr. cimulus, Lat. a heap, Skinner.] A measure of corn containing four bushels. Bailey.

COOP. * n. s. [Icel. kuppa; Su. kopp; Dutch, kuype.

Ray observes, that coop was a general expression for a vessel to enclose any thing.]

1. A barrel; a vessel for the preservation of liquids.

2. A cage; a pen for animals; as poultry or sheep.

Gracchus was slain, the day the chickens refused to eat out of the coop; and Claudius Pulcher underwent the like success, when he contemned the tripudary augurations. Brown.

There were a great many crammed capons together in a coop.

L'Estrange.

To COOP. v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up in a narrow compass; to confine; to cage; to imprison: when it is used absolutely, it has often, perhaps always, the intensive particle up.

That pale, that white-fac'd shore,
Whose foot spurns back the ocean's roaring tides,
And coops from other lands her islanders.

Shakspeare, K. John.

The Englishmen did coop up the lord Ravenstein, that he stirred not; and likewise held in strait siege the town. Bacon.

In the taking of a town the poor escape better than the rich; for the one is let go, and the other is plundered and cooped up. L'Estrange.

Twice conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown,
Coop'd up a second time within your town!

Who dare not issue forth in open field. Dryden, Æneid.

One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind;

Coop'd up, he seem'd in earth and seas confin'd. Dryden, Juv.

Coop'd in a narrow isle, observing dreams

With flattering wizards. Dryden, Juv.

The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,

Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng. Dryden, Æneid.

The contempt of all other knowledge, as if it were nothing in comparison of law or physick, of astrology or chymistry, coops the understanding up within narrow bounds, and hinders it from looking abroad into other provinces of the intellectual world. Locke.

They are cooped in close by the laws of their countries, and the strict guards of those whose interest it is to keep them ignorant. Locke.

What! coop whole armies in our walls again. Pope.

COOPE'E. n. s. [coupe, French.] A motion in dancing.

CO'OPER. n. s. [from coop.] One that makes coops or barrels.

Societies of artificers and tradesmen, belonging to some towns corporate, such as weavers and coopers, by virtue of their charters, pretend to privilege and jurisdiction. Child.

CO'OPERAGE. n. s. [from cooper.] The price paid for cooper's work.

To COOPERATE. * v. n. [old Fr. coöperer, from con and opera, Latin.]

1. To labour jointly with another to the same end: it has with before the agent, and to before the end.

It puzzleth and perplexeth the conceits of many, that perhaps would otherwise cooperate with him, and makes a man walk almost alone to his own ends. Bacon.

By giving man a free will, he allows man that highest satisfaction and privilege of cooperating to his own felicity. Boyle.

2. To concur in producing the same effect.

His mercy will not forgive offenders, or his benignity co-operate to their conversions. Brown, Vulg. Err.

All these causes cooperating, must, at last, weaken their motion. Cheyne, Phil. Prm.

The special acts and impressions by which the Divine Spirit introduces this charge, and how far human liberty cooperates with it, are subjects beyond our comprehension. Rogers.

COOPERATION. n. s. [from cooperate.] The act of contributing or concurring to the same end.

We might work any effect without and against matter; and this not holpen by the cooperation of angels or spirits, but only by the unity and harmony of nature. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COO'PERATIVE. * adj. [from cooperate.] Promoting the same end jointly.

For Age with Virtue is cooperative.

Davies, Wit's Pilg. T. 3. b.

COO'PERATOR. n. s. [from cooperate.] He that, by joint endeavours, promotes the same end with others.

To COOPTATE. * v. a. [Fr. co-opter, Lat. coopto. Dr. Johnson admits the substantive, though without example. The parent verb is as good a word.] To choose. Cockeram.

COOPTATION. † n. s. [coopto, Latin.] Adoption; assumption.

Dubitation is the beginning of all knowledge: I confess this is true in the first election and co-optation of a friend, to come into the true knowledge of him by queries and doubts.

Howell, Lett. i. v. 19.

COORDINATE. † adj. [con and ordinatus, Latin.]

Holding the same rank; not being subordinate. Thus shell-fish may be divided into two coordinate kinds, crustaceous and testaceous; each of which is again divided into many species, subordinate to the kind, but coordinate to each other.

Other bishops — might either appoint two presbyters, either co-ordinate or subaltern, to serve one church; or one presbyter to serve two churches.

H. Wharton, Def. of Pluralities, (1692,) p. 53.

A co-ordinate power was given by the bishop to them both.

Ibid. p. 54.

The word Analysis signifies the general and particular heads of a discourse, with their mutual connexions, both coordinate and subordinate, drawn out into one or more tables. Watts.

COORDINATELY. adv. [from coordinate.] In the same rank; in the same relation; without subordination.

COORDINATENESS. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of being coordinate.

COORDINATION. n. s. [from coordinate.] The state of holding the same rank; of standing in the same relation to something higher; collateralness.

In this high court of parliament there is a rare coordination of power, a wholesome mixture betwixt monarchy, optinacy, and democracy. Howell, Pre-eminence of Parliament.

When these petty intrigues of a play are so ill ordered, that they have no coherence with the other, I must grant that Lysideus has reason to tax that want of due connexion; for coordination in a play is as dangerous and unnatural as in a state. Dryden on Dramatick Poetry.

COOT. † n. s. [maer-koel, Dut. cotte, French.] A small black water-fowl, seen often in fens and marshes.

Unfledge 'em of their tires,
Their wires, their partlets, pins, and perriwigs,
And they appear like bald coots in the nest.

Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

A lake, the haunt

Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant. Dryden, Fables.

COP. † n. s. [kop, Dut. cop, Sax.] The head; the top of any thing; any thing rising to a head. As a cop, vulgarly cock of hay; a cop-castle, properly cop-castle, a small castle or house on a hill. A cop of cherrystones for cop, a pile of stones one laid upon another; a tuft on the head of birds.

Upon the cop right of his nose he had

A wart, and thereon stode a tuft of hairs. Chaucer, C. T. Prol.
They droven him out withouten the eytee, and ledde him to the coppe of the hill. Wicliffe, St. Luke, iv.

Few of them have cops or crested tufts upon their heads.

Holland, Tr. of Plin. Nat. Hist. b. xi.

CO'PAL. n. s. The Mexican term for a gum.

COPARCENARY. n. s. from coparcener.] Joint succession to any inheritance.

In descent to all the daughters in coparcenary, for want of sons, the chief house is allotted to the eldest daughter.

Hale, Hist. of Common Law.

COPARCENER. n. s. [from con and particeps, Lat.] Coparceners are otherwise called parceners; and in common law, are such as have equal portion in the inheritance of the ancestor. Cowel.

This great lordship was broken and divided, and partition made between the five daughters; in every of these portions, the coparceners severally exercised the same jurisdiction royal, which the earl marshal and his sons had used, in the whole province. Davies on Ireland.

COPARCENY. n. s. An equal share of coparceners.

Phillips, World of Words.

COPARTMENT. * n. s. Compartment; which see.

In a copartment, towards the head, and under the semicircle, of the letter, are his initials. Watson, Hist. of E. P. iii. 391.

COPARTNER. † n. s. [co and partner.] One that has a share in some common stock or affair; one equally concerned; a sharer; a partaker; a partner. Milton has used it both with of and in.

So should I have copartners in my pain;
And fellowship in woe doth woe assuage.

Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

Our faithful friends,

The associates and copartners of our loss.

Milton, P. L.

Shall I to him make known

As yet my change, and give him to partake

Full happiness with me? Or rather not;

But keep the odds of knowledge in my power,

Without copartner?

Milton, P. L.

Rather by them

I gain'd what I have gain'd, and with them dwell

Copartner in these regions of the world.

Milton, P. R.

Love gives us a real possession and enjoyment of God; it makes us copartners with Him in Himself.

Scott, Chr. Life, i. iii.

COPARTNERSHIP. † n. s. [from copartner.] The state of bearing an equal part, or possessing an equal share.

In case the father left only daughters, the daughters equally succeeded to their father as in copartnership. Hale.

At Amsterdam the one vessel took in ballast only; the other laden with herrings, in copartnership with one Peter Heinbergh, sailed away for Stettin in Pomerania. Milton, Letters of State.

CO'PATIN. adj. [from cop.] High raised; pointed.

Hammer.

Oh, fine villain! a silken doublet, a velvet hose, a scarlet cloke, and a copatin hat. Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

COPAYVA. n. s. [It is sometimes written capivi, capivi, capayva, copayva, cupayva, cupayba.] A gum which distils from a tree in Brasil. It is much used in disorders of the urinary passages.

COPE. † n. s. [Sax. cappe. And see Cop.]

1. Any thing with which the head is covered.

2. A sacerdotal cloak, or vestment worn in sacred ministration.

The principal minister using a decent cope.

Const. and Can. Ecc. 24.

The cope answers to the colobium used by the Latin, and the εἰσπορ used by the Greek church. It was at first a common habit, being a coat without sleeves, but afterwards used as a church-vestment, only made very rich by embroidery and the like. Wheatly on the Comm. Prayer.

3. Any thing which is spread over the head; as the concave of the skies; any archwork over a door.

All these things that are contained

Within this goodly cope, both most and least,

Their being have, and daily are increast.

Spenser.

Over head the dismal hiss

Of fiery darts in flaming volleys flew;

And, flying, vaulted either host with fire;

So, under fiery cope, together rush'd

Both battles main.

Milton, P. L.

The scholar believes there is no man under the cope of heaven, who is so knowing as his master.

Dryden.

7b COPE. † v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover, as with a cope.

A very large bridge, that is all made of wood, and coped over head. Addison on Italy.

2. To contend with; to oppose. Dr. Johnson introduces, as the sole example, a passage from Shakspeare's Lear; where, however, the verb is neuter; the word withal, which is connected with cope, being omitted by him. But the active sense of cope is not uncommon.

I love to cope him in these sullen fits.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

We must not stint

Our necessary actions, in the fear

To cope malicious censurers.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. VIII.

3. To reward; to give in return. This is our old verb to cope, or coep, i. e. to chap, or buy; Dutch, koop. See COPE-MAN.

I and my friend

Have, by your wisdom, been this day acquitted

Of grievous penalties; in lieu whereof,

Three thousand ducats, due unto the Jew,

We freely cope your courteous pains withal.

Shakspeare.

To COPE. † v. n.

1. To contend; to struggle; to strive. It has with before the thing or person opposed. [In this sense it is a word of doubtful etymology. The conjecture of Junius derives it from koop, to buy, or some other word of the same import; so that to cope with, signifies to interchange blows, or any thing else, with another. It may, with as much propriety, be referred to cop, the head; and so imply, to make head against, like the French expression, "faire tête à quelqu'un."] Let our trains

March by us, that we may peruse the men

We should have cop'd withal.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

It is likely thou wilt undertake

A thing, like death, to chide away this shame,

That copes with death itself, to 'scape from it.

Shakspeare.

But Eve was Eve;

This far his overmatch, who, self-deceiv'd

And rash, before hand had no better weigh'd

The strength he was to cope with, or his own.

Milton, P. R.

They perfectly understood both the hares and the enemy

they were to cope withal.

L'Estrange.

On every plain,

Host cop'd with host, dire was the din of war.

Philips.

Their generals have not been able to cope with the troops of Athens, which I have conducted. Addison, Whig-Examiner.

If the mind apply itself first to easier subjects, and things near akin to what is already known; and then advance to the more remote and knotty parts of knowledge by slow degrees, it will be able, in this manner, to cope with great difficulties, and prevail over them with amazing and happy success.

Watts, on the Mind.

2. To encounter; to interchange kindness or sentiments.

Thou fresh piece

Of excellent witchcraft, who of force must know

The royal food thou cop'st with.

Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Thou art e'en as just a man

As e'er my conversation cop'd withal.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

To COPE. v. a. To embrace. Not in use.

I will make him tell the tale anew:

Where, how, how oft, how long ago, and when

He hath, and is again to cope your wife.

Shakspeare, Othello.

COPEMAN. * n. s. [from the old verb cope, to exchange; and Dutch, koopman, a buyer.] 'A chapman.

For chapman we now say chapman, which is as much as to say — A merchant or cope-man.

Verstegan, Rest. of Dec. Intell. ch. 7.

Assure thee, Celia, he that would sell thee,

Only for hope of gain, and that uncertain,

He would have sold his part of paradise

For ready money, had he met a cope-man.

B. Johnson, For.

COPE'RNICAN. * adj. Relating to the system of Copernicus; in which the sun is supposed at rest in the centre, and the planets with the earth to move in ellipses round him.

The Cartesian philosophy begins now to be almost universally rejected, while the Copernican system continues to be universally received.

A. Smith, Hist. of Astronomy, § 4.

It is not necessary, that he who looks with pleasure on the colour of a flower should study the principles of vegetation, or that the Ptolemaick and Copernican system should be compared before the light of the sun can gladden, or its warmth invigorate.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 125.

CO'PESMATE. † n. s. [perhaps for cutsmate, a companion in drinking, or one that dwells under the same cope, for house, Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from cope in the sense of exchange, I think; one who interchanges kindness with another.] Companion; friend. An old word, Dr. Johnson observes, citing only Spenser. But it is a common word, and among our best authors.

Ne ever staid in place, ne spake to wight,

'Till then the fox his copesmate he hath found.

Spenser, Hubb. Tale

Mis-shapen Time, copesmate of ugly Night.

Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

O, this is the female copesmate of my son.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.

If the gagger or his copesmates had dealt thus with me, I would have cast in their teeth forgery and false play.

Montagu, App. to Ctes. p. 24.

This ponderous confuter, elected by his ghostly patrons to be my copesmate.

Milton, Colasterion.

CO'PIER. n. s. [from copy.]

1. One that copies; a transcriber.

A coin is in no danger of having its characters altered by copiers and transcribers.

Addison on Coins.

2. One that imitates; a plagiarist; an imitator.

Without invention a painter is but a copier, and a poet but a plagiarist of others.

Dezobry, Dufresnoy.

Let the faint copier, on old Tiber's shore,

Nor mean the task, each breathing bust explore;

Line after line with painful patience trace;

This Roman grandeur, that Athenian grace.

Ticket.

CO'PING. † n. s. [from cope; called also copping, from cop.] The upper tire of masonry which covers the wall.

All these were of costly stones, even from the foundation unto the coping.

Kings, vii. 9.

The coping, the modillions, or dentils, make a noble shew by their graceful projections.

Addison, Freeholder.

COPIOUS. † adj. [old Fr. copieux, copieux; from the Lat. copia.]

1. Plentiful; abundant; exuberant; in great quantities.

Use, as in dance, the stately trees, and spread

Their branches hung with copious fruit.

Milton, P. L.

Full measure only bounds

Excess, before the all-bounteous king, who show'd

With copious hand, rejoicing in their joy.

Milton, P. L.

This acauline acrimony indicates the copious use of vinegar and acid fruits.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

The tender heart is peace,

And kindly pours its copious treasures forth

In various converse.

Thomson, Spring.

2. Abounding in words or images; not barren; not confined; not concise.

Hail, Son of God, Saviour of men; thy name

Shall be the copious matter of my song

Henceforth; and never shall my harp thy praise

Forget, nor from thy Father's praise disjoin.

Milton, P. L.

CO'PIOUSLY. † adv. [from copious.]

1. Plentifully; abundantly; in great quantities.

Sherwood.

The boy being made to drink copiously of tar-water, this prevented or lessened the fever.

Bp. Berkeley, B. Th. on Tar-Water.

2. At large; without brevity or conciseness; diffusely. These several remains have been so copiously described by abundance of travellers, and other writers, that it is very difficult to make any new discoveries on so beaten a subject.

Addison.

COPIOUSNESS. † n. s. [from copious.] •

1. Plenty; abundance; great quantity; exuberance. The copiousness and pleasure of the argument hath carried me a little further than I made account.

Howell, Instruct. For. Trav. p. 158.

2. Diffusion; exuberance of stile.

The Roman orator endeavoured to imitate the copiousness of Homer, and the Latin poet made it his business to reach the conciseness of Demosthenes.

Dryden.

COPIST. † n. s. [old Fr. copiste.] A copyer; a transcriber; an imitator.

As for the ancients and elders they are become penitentiaries, proctors in the court ecclesiastical, detarists, bullists, copists, &c. Harmer, Tr. of Ben's Sermon. (1587) p. 134.

COPLAND. n. s. A piece of ground in which the land terminates with an acute angle.

Dict.

TO COPLAND. † v. a. [from con and plant.] To plant together, at the same time.

France being a passable, and plain pervious, continent, the Romans quickly diffused and rooted themselves in every part of it, and so coplanded their language, which in a short revolution of time came to be called Romand.

Howell, L. H. iv. 19.

COPPORTION. † n. s. [from con and portion.] Equal share.

Myself will beare a part, copportion of your packe.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. ii. 47.

COPPED. † adj. [from cop.] Rising to a top or head.

The blind mole casts

Copp'd hills towards heaven.

Shakspeare, Pericles.

It was broad in its basis, and rose copp'd like a sugar-loaf.

Wiscman, Sur.

A galeated eschimus being copp'd and somewhat conick.

Woodward.

COPPEL. n. s. [This word is variously spelt; as copel, cupel, cuple, and cuppel; but I cannot find its etymology.] An instrument used in chymistry in the form of a dish, made of ashes, well washed, to cleanse them from all their salt; or of bones thoroughly calcined. Its use is to try and purify gold and silver, which is done by mingling lead with the metal, and exposing it in the coppel to a violent fire a long while. The impurities of the metal will then be carried off in dross, which is called the litharge of gold and silver. The refiners call the coppel a test.

Harris.

COPPER. n. s. [koper, Dutch, cuprum, Lat.] One of the six primitive metals.

Copper is the most ductile and malleable metal, after gold and silver. Of a mixture of copper and lapis calaminaris is formed brass; a composition of copper and tin makes bell-metal; and copper and brass, melted in equal quantities, produces what the French call bronze, used for figures and statues.

Chambers.

Copper is heavier than iron or tin; but lighter than silver, lead, and gold.

Hildon Fossils.

Two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold.

Ezra, viii. 27.

COPPER. n. s. A vessel made of copper; commonly used for a boiler larger than a moveable pot.

They boiled it in a copper to the half; then they poured it into earthen vessels.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COPPER-NOSE. † n. s. [copper and nose, Dr. Johnson says. But it is probably a corruption of the French, couperose, "an extreme redness of the face, accompanied with many pimples and rubies, especially about the nose." Cotgrave. And Sherwood translates "coper-nosed" by couperose; which adjective is rendered also in Cotgrave crimson-faced and copper-nosed.] A red nose.

He having colour enough, and the other higher, is too flaming a praise for a good complexion: I had a love Helen's golden tongue had commended Troilus for a copper-nose.

Shakspeare.

Gutta rosacea ariseth in little hard tubercles, affecting the face all over with great itching, which, being scratched, looks red, and rise in great welks, rendering the visage fiery; and, makes copper-noses, as we generally express them.

Wiscman.

COPPER-PLATE. n. s. A plate on which pictures are engraven for the neater impression: distinguished from a wooden cut.

COPPER-WORK. n. s. [copper and work.] A place where copper is worked or manufactured.

This is like those wrought at copper-works.

Woodward.

COPPERAS. n. s. [kopperose, Dut. couperouse, Fr. supposed to be found in copper mines only.] A name given to three sorts of vitriol; the green, the bluish green, and the white, which are produced in the mines of Germany, Hungary, and other countries. But what is commonly sold here for copperas, is an artificial vitriol, made of a kind of stones found on the sea-shore in Essex, Hampshire, and so westward, ordinarily called gold stones from their colour. They abound with iron, and are exposed to the weather in beds above ground, and receive the rains and dews, which in time breaks and dissolves the stones: the liquor that runs off is pumped into boilers, in which is first put old iron, which, in boiling, dissolves. This fictitious copperas, in many respects, agrees with the native green vitriol.

Chambers, and Hill.

It may be questioned, whether, in this operation, the iron or copperas be transuted, from the combination of copperas with copper, and the iron remaining after conversion.

Brown.

COPPER-RICH. † adj. [from copper.] Containing copper.

In this fell there is a large vein of copper-rich sulphur.

Robinson, Nat. Hist. of Cumb. and Westm. 1779.

COPPERSMITH. n. s. [copper and smith.] One that manufactures copper.

Salmoneus, as the Grecian tale is,

Was a coppersmith of Elis;

Up at his forge by morning-peep.

Swift.

COPPERWORM. n. s. [teredo, in Latin.]

1. A little worm in ships.

2. A moth that fretteth garments.

3. A worm breeding in one's hand.

Ainsworth.

COPPERY. adj. [from copper.] Containing copper; made of copper.

Some springs of Hungary, highly impregnated with vitriolick salts, dissolve the body of iron, passing to the spring, and deposit, in lieu of the iron, particles carried off, coppery particles, brought with the water out of the neighbouring copper-mine.

Woodward on Fossils.

COPPICE. n. s. [couperceux, Fr. from couper, to cut or lop. It is often written copse.] Low woods cut at stated times for fuel; a place over-run with brushwood.

A land, each side whereof was bounded both with high timber trees, and copser of far more humble growth.

Sidney.

Upon the edge of yonder coppice,

A stand, where you may have the fairest shoot.

Shakspeare.

In coppice woods, if you leave staddles too thick, they run to bushes and briars, and have little clean underwood. Bacon.

The willows and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays. Milton, Lycidas.

Raise trees in your seminaries and nurseries, and you may transplant them for coppice ground, walks, or hedges.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

The rate of coppice lands will fall upon the discovery of coal-mines. Locke.

COPPING.* See COPING.

CO'PPLE-DUST. n. s. [probably for coppel, or cupel dust.] Powder used in purifying metals, or the gross parts separated by the cupel.

It may be also tried by incorporating powder of steel, or coppel-dust, by pouncing into the quicksilver. Bacon.

COPPLE-STONES are lumps and fragments of stone or marble, broke from the adjacent cliffs, rounded by being bowled and tumbled to and again by the action of the water. Woodward.

CO'PPLED. adj. [from cop.] Rising in a conick form; rising to a point.

There is some difference in this shape, some being flatter on the top, others more coppled. Woodward on Fossils.

COPSE. n. s. [abbreviated from coppice.] Low wood cut at a certain growth for fuel; a place overgrown with short wood.

The East quarters of the shire are not destitute of copse woods. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Oaks and brambles, if the copse be burn'd,
Confounded lie, to the same ashes turn'd. Waller.

But in what quarter of the copse it lay,
His eye by certain level could survey. Dryden, Fab.

To COPSE. † v. a. [from the noun.] To preserve underwoods.

Nature itself hath copsed and bound us in from flying out, and hath designed to every man his proper business, that he may not stray nor wander abroad. Farrindon's Serm. (1657.) p. 439.

The neglect of copsing wood cut down, hath been of very evil consequence. Swift, Address to Parliament.

CO'RSY.* adj. [from copse.] Having copses.

The flood,

And trading bark with low contracted sail,
Linger among the reeds and corsy banks
To listen; and to view the joyous scene. Dyer's Fleecce.

CO'PRICK.* n. s. [from Coptus, converted, by changing K into G, into the Gr. Αιγυπτος.] The language of the Copts; the ancient Egyptian language.

The Arabick in this Lex. Polygl. will take in all or most of Golius, &c.—For the Coptick, I doubt not but Mr. Beal hath heard of A. Kircheri Prodomus Copticus.

Worthington to Hartlib, p. 283.

COPULA. n. s. [Latin.] The word which unites the subject and predicate of a proposition; as, books are dear.

The copula is the form of a proposition; it represents the act of the mind, affirming or denying. Watts, Logick.

To CO'PULATE. v. a. [copulo, Lat.] To unite; to conjoin; to link together.

To CO'PULATE. † n. To come together as different sexes.

Not only the persons so copulating are infected, but also their children. Wiseman, Surgery.

CO'PULATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Joined.

If the force of custom, simple and separate, be great, the force of custom copulate, and conjoined, and collegiate, is far greater. Bacon.

COPULATION. † n. s. [old Fr. copulation.]

1. The congress or embrace of the two sexes.

Sundry kinds, even of conjugal copulation, are prohibited as dishonest. Hooker, iv. § 11.

2. Any conjunction. Though Dr. Johnson has omitted this ancient and present meaning, he furnishes, as usual, a good example of the word.

His copulation of monosyllables supplying the quantity of a trissyllable to his intent. Puttenham, Art of Eng. Poesie.

These virtues are so conjoined together among themselves, with a certain mutual copulation.

Sir M. Sandys, Fss. (1634.) p. 9.

Wit, you know, is the unexpected copulation of ideas, the discovery of some occult relation between images in appearance remote from each other. Johnson, Idler, No. 194.

CO'PULATIVE. adj. [copulativus, Latin.] A term of grammar.

Copulative propositions are those which have more subjects or predicates connected by affirmative or negative conjunctions; as, riches and honours are temptations to pride; Caesar conquered the Gauls and the Britons: neither gold nor jewels will purchase immortality. Watts, Logick.

CO'PULATIVE.* n. s.

1. A conjunction, in grammar.

Here the copulative "And" must be expounded "Or."

Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xix. 12.

The conjunctions, which conjoin both sentences and their meanings, are either copulatives or continuatives. The principal copulative in English is AND. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

2. Connection; conjunction, by marriage.

They understand polygamy to be a conjunction of divers copulatives in number, which is not understood till a person proceeds unto a fourth wife, which makes more than one copulative in the rule of marriage.

Rienut, State of the Greek Ch. p. 307.

CO'PY. † n. s. [copie, Fr. copia, low Lat. Quod cupiam facta est copia exscribendi. Junius inclines, after his manner, to derive it from κόπος, labour; because, says he, to copy another's writing is very painful and laborious.]

1. A transcript from the archetype or original.

If virtue's self were lost, we might

From your fair mind new copies write. Waller.

I have not the vanity to think my copy equal to the original.

Denham.

He stept forth, not only the copy of God's hands, but also the copy of his perfections, a kind of image or representation of the Deity in small.

The Romans having sent to Athens, and the Greek cities of Italy, for the copies of the best laws, chose ten legislators to put them into form. Swift.

2. An individual book; one of many books: as, a good or fair copy.

The very having of the books of God was a matter of no small charge, as they could not be had otherwise than in written copies. Hooker, v. § 22.

3. The autograph; the original; the archetype; that from which any thing is copied.

It was the copy of our conference;

In bed he slept not, for my urging it;

At board he fed not, for my urging it.

Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

Let him first learn to write, after a copy, all the letters in the vulgar alphabet.

Holder, Elem. of Speech.

The first of them I have forgotten, and cannot easily retrieve, because the copy is at the press.

Dryden.

4. An instrument by which any conveyance is made in law.

Thou know'st that Banquo and his Fleance lives;

But in them nature's copy's not eternal. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

5. A picture drawn from another picture.

Originals and copies much the same,

The picture's value is the painter's name.

Bramston.

6. Abundance; plenty. [old Fr. copie, abundance; Lat. copia. This meaning of our own word, though unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, is also in our old lexicography.]

C O P

That copy or store that he hath given us.

Translators of the Bible to the Reader.

Pls. Which would you choose now, mistress?

Pla. 'Cannos tell:

The copy does confound one.

B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CO'PY-BOOK. † n. s. [copy and book.] A book in which copies are written for learners to imitate.

Fair as a text B in a copy-book. Shakspeare, I. ov. L. Lost.

CO'PY-HOLD. n. s. [copy and hold.] A tenure, for which the tenant hath nothing to shew but the copy of the rolls made by the steward of his lord's court: for the steward, as he enrolls other things done in the lord's court, so he registers such tenants as are admitted in the court, to any parcel of land or tenement belonging to the manor; and the transcript of this is called the court roll, the copy of which the tenant takes from him, and keeps as his only evidence. This is called a base tenure, because it holds at the will of the lord; yet not simply, but according to the custom of the manor: so that if a copy-holder break not the custom of the manor, and thereby forfeit his tenure, he cannot be turned out of the lord's pleasure. These customs of manors vary in one point or other, almost in every manor. Some copy-holds are finable, and some certain: that which is finable, the lord rates at what fine or income he pleases, when the tenant is admitted into it: that which is certain is a kind of inheritance, and called in many places customary; because the tenant dying, and the hold being void, the next of blood paying the customary fine, as two shillings for an acre, or so, cannot be denied his admission. Some copy-holders have, by custom, the wood growing upon their own land, which by law they could not have. Some hold by the verge in ancient demesne; and though they hold by copy, yet are they, in account, a kind of freeholder: for, if such a one commit felony, the king hath annum, diem, and ratum, as in case of freehold. Some others hold by common tenure, called mere copy-hold; and they committing felony, their land escheats to the lord of the manor. Coxw.

If a customary tenant die, the widow shall have what the law calls her free bench in all his copy-hold lands. Addison.

COPY-HOLDER. † n. s. [from copyhold.] One that is possessed of land in copyhold.

But now thou art mine

For one-and-twenty years, or for three lives:

Choose which thou wilt, I'll make thee a copyholder.

B. Jonson, Staple of News.

By an enumeration of real circumstances, he gives us the following lively draught of the miserable tenement, yet ample services, of a poor copyholder.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iv. 44.

COPY-RIGHT.* n. s. The property which an author, or his assignee, has in a literary work.

Much may be collected from the several legislative recognitions of copy-rights. Blackstone.

Notwithstanding that the statute secures only fourteen years of exclusive right, it has always been understood by the trade, that he, who buys the copy-right of a book from the author, obtains a perpetual property; and upon that belief, numberless bargains are made to transfer that property after the expiration of the statutory term. Johnson, Boswell's Life of Johnson.

To CO'PY. † v. a. [from the noun; and old Fr. copier.]

1. To transcribe; to write after an original: it has sometimes out, a kind of pleonasm.

C O Q

These are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out. Prov. xxv. 1.

He who hurts a harmless neighbour's peace,

Who loves a lie, lame slander helps about,

Who writes a libel, or who copies out.

Pope, Epist.

2. To imitate; to propose to imitation; to endeavour to resemble.

He that borrows other men's experience, with this design of copying it out, possesses himself of one of the greatest advantages. Decayo Fifty.

Set the examples, and their souls inflame;

To copy out their great forefathers' fame. Dryden, K. Arthur.

To copy her few nymphs aspir'd,

Her virtues fewer swains admir'd.

Swift.

To CO'PY. v. n.

1. To do any thing in imitation of something else.

Some imagine, that whatsoever they find in the picture of a master, who has acquired reputation, must of necessity be excellent; and never fail, when they copy, to follow the bad as well as the good things. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. It has sometimes from before the thing imitated.

When a painter copies from the life, he has no privilege to alter features and lineaments, under pretence that his picture will look better. Dryden.

3. Sometimes after.

Several of our countrymen, and Mr. Dryden in particular, seem very often to have copied after it in their dramatick writings, and in their poems upon love. Addison, Spect.

CO'PYER.* n. s. A copier. See COPIER. The word copyist is now more common.

What copyer would have stifled those passages in them both? Bentley, Phil. Lips. § xxxiii.

CO'PYIST.* n. s. [from copy; formerly copist, which see.]

1. A transcriber.

The first may be ascribed to the copyist's haste, negligence, or ignorance. Blackwall's Sac. Cass. ii. 212.

The line on which copyists wrote, may be one cause of errors in transcribing.

Abp. Newcome, Ess. on Tr. of the Bible, p. 376.

2. An imitator.

No original writer ever remained so unrivalled by succeeding copyists, as this Sicilian master, [Theocritus.]

Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope, i. 9.

COQUELICOT.* n. s. [Fr.] The red corn-rose, Cotgrave: a colour nearly red so called, in modern times, from it.

To COQUET. v. a. [from the noun.] To entertain with compliments and amorous tattle; to treat with an appearance of amorous tenderness.

You are coquetting a maid of honour, my lord looking on to see how the gamsters play, and I railing at you both.

Swift.

To COQUET. v. n. To act the lover, to entice by blandishments.

Phyllis, who but a month ago

Was marry'd to the Tunbridge beau,

I saw coquetting t'other night,

In publick, with that odious knight.

Swift.

COQUETRY. n. s. [coqueterie, Fr.] Affectation of amorous advances; desire of attracting notice.

I was often in company with a couple of charming women, who had all the wit and beauty one could desire in female companions, without a dash of coquetry, that from time to time gave me a great many agreeable torments.

Addison, Spect.

COQUET'TE. † n. s. [coquette, Fr. from coquart, a prattler, Dr. Johnson says; which may be from caqueter, to tattle. The old French is cokatt for coquart. V. Lacombe. One might suppose Cotgrave to have been jilted by some coquette, and that, in revenge, he heaped upon the name the following choice terms: "COQUETTE, a prattling or proud gossip; a fisking or flipperous minx; a cocket or rattling housewife; a titisill; a flebergebit!" Among these appellations we see cocket; which was the English word at that time, and which is perhaps the meaning of Ben Jonson's "simper-the-cockets" in one of his Masques. Our old adjective cocket is pert, jolly. See COCKET.] A gay, airy girl; a woman who endeavours to attract notice.

If you would see the humour of a coquette pushed to the last excess, you may find an instance of it in the following story.—A young coquette widow in France having been followed by a Gascon of quality, &c. Tatler, No. 126.

• The light coquettes and sylphs alert repair,
And sport and flutter in the fields of air. Pope.

A coquette and a tinder-box are spark-led.

Not less vain of her person than her politicks, this stately coquet, the guardian of the protestant faith, the terror of the sea, the mediatrix of the factions of France, and the scourge of Spain, was infinitely mortified, if an ambassador, at the first audience, did not tell her she was the finest woman in Europe. Watson, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 493.

COQUE'TTISH.* adj. [from coquette.] Affecting the manner of a coquette.

Their hair falls in long plaits down their backs, and a veil or handkerchief, twisted round in a coquetish manner, serves them for a very becoming head-dress.

Swinburne, Trag. through Spain, L. 44.

COR.* n. s. [Lat. corus.] This word is in our old lexicography for the "measure of a pottle." Cock-ram. Properly, it is an Hebrew measure.

How muche owist thou to my lord? whiche, answerde, an hundred coris of wheat. Wicliffe, St. Luke, xvi.

Likewise also of wheat even to an hundred coris.

Exile, viii. 20. Present Translation.

• Ye shall offer the tenth part of a bath out of the cor, which is an homer of ten baths. Ezek. xlv. 14.

The tenth part of a bath of oil is the hundredth part of a cor, which amounts to about six pints of our measure, according to bishop Cumberland. Lowth on Ezekiel.

CO'RACLE.* n. s. [corwagle, Welsh, probably from corium, leather, Lat.] A boat used in Wales by fishers; made by drawing leather or oiled cloth upon a frame of wicker work.

I have been informed, that boats made of wicker, and covered with a skin, resembling the upper shell of a tortoise, are frequently used for passing rivers in different parts of India.—Boats of a similar structure are to be found in Wales, called coracles. Hole on the Arab. Nights' Entert. p. 95.

CORAL.* n. s. [corallium, Lat.]

1. Red coral is a plant of as great hardness and stony nature, while growing in the water, as it has after long exposure to the air. The vulgar opinion, that coral is soft, while in the sea, proceeds from a soft and thin coat, of a crustaceous matter, covering it while it is growing, and which is taken off before it is packed up for use. The whole coral plant grows to a foot or more in height, and is variously ramified. It is thickest at the stem, and its branches grow gradually smaller. It grows to stones, without a root, or without any way penetrating them, but as it is found to grow, and take in its nourishment in the manner of plants, and to produce flowers and seeds, or at least a matter analogous to seeds, it properly belongs to the vegetable kingdom. Hill's Materia Medica.

In the sea, upon the south-west of Sicily, much coral is found. It is a submarine plant: it hath no leaves: it brancheth only when it is under water. It is soft, and green of colour; but being brought into the air, it becometh hard and shining red, as we see. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

This gentleman, desirous to find the nature of coral, caused a man to go down a hundred fathom into the sea, with express orders to take notice whether it were hard or soft in the place where it groweth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He hears the crackling-sound of coral woods,
And sees the secret source of subterranean floods.

Dryden, Virg.

A turret was inclos'd

Within the wall, of alabaster white,

And crimson coral, for the queen of night,

Who takes in Sylvan sports her chaste delight.

Dryden.

Or where's the sense, direct or moral,

That teeth are pearl, or lips are coral?

Prior.

2. The piece of coral which children have about their necks, imagined to assist them in breeding teeth.

Her infant grandame's coral next it grew;

The bells she gingled, and the whistle blew.

Pope.

CORAL-TREE. n. s. [corallodendron, Lat.]

It is a native of America, and produces very beautiful scarlet flowers; but never any seeds in the European gardens. Miller.

CO'RALLINE. adj. [corallinus, Lat.] Consisting of coral; approaching to coral.

At such time as the sea is agitated, it takes up into itself terrestrial matter of all kinds, and in particular the coralline matter, letting it fall again as it becomes calm. Woodward.

CO'RALLINE. n. s. [from the adjective.]

Coralline is a sea-plant used in medicine; but much inferior to the coral in hardness, sometimes greenish, sometimes yellowish, often reddish, and frequently white. Hill.

In Falmouth there is a sort of sand, or rather coralline, that lies under the owse. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CO'RALLOID. } adv. [κορραλλοειδης.] Resembling CO'RALLOIDAL. } coral.

Now that plants and ligneous bodies may indurate under water, without approachment of air, we have experiment in coralline, with many coralloidal concretions. Brown.

The pentadrous, columnar, coralloid bodies, that are composed of plates set lengthways of the body, and passing from the surface to the axis of it. Woodward on Fossils.

CO'RANT.* n. s. [courant, Fr.]

1. A lofty sprightly dance.

It is harder to dance a corant well than a jig; so in conversation, even, easy, and agreeable, more than points of wit. Temple.

I would as soon believe a widow in great grief for her husband, because I saw her dance a corant about his coffin. Walsb.

2. A paper of news. See COURANT.

All the lords

Have him in that esteem for his relations,

Corants, advises, correspondences

With this ambassador, and that agent!

B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CORA'NTO.* n. s. See COURANTO. An air, or dance.

After this, they danced galliards and corantos.

B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CORB.* n. s. [Fr. corbeau.] A diminutive of corbel, which see.] An ornament in building.

It was a bridge ybuilt in goodly wize

With curious corbes and pendants graven faire.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 6.

CO'RBAN. n. s. [קרבן] An alms-basket; a receptacle of charity; a gift; an alms.

They think to satisfy all obligations to duty by their corban of religion. King Charles.

Corban stands for an offering or gift made to God, or his temple. The Jews sometimes swore by corban, or the gifts offered unto God. If a man made all his fortune corban, or devoted it to God, he was forbidden to use it. If all that he was to give his wife, or his father and mother, was declared corban, he was no longer permitted to allow them necessary subsistence. Even debtors were permitted to defraud their creditors, by consecrating their debt to God. Our Saviour reproaches the Jews, in the Gospel, with these uncharitable and irreligious vows. By this word such persons were likewise meant as devoted themselves to the service of God and his temple. Corban signifies also the treasury of the temple, where the offerings, which were made in money were deposited. Calmet.

CORBE. adj. [corbe, Fr.] Crooked.

• Or siker thy head very tottie is,
So on thy corbe shoulder it leans amiss.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb.

CO'RBEILS.† n. s. [Fr. corbeille, a wicker-basket. Cotgrave.] Little baskets used in fortification, filled with earth, and set upon the parapet, to shelter the men in firing upon the besiegers.

CO'RBEL. n. s. [In architecture.] The representation of a basket, sometimes placed on the heads of the caryatides.

CO'RBEL. } n. s.
CO'RBI. }

1. A short piece of timber sticking out six or eight inches from a wall, sometimes placed for strength under the semi-girders of a platform.

2. A niche or hollow left in walls for figures or statues. Chambers.

CO'RBY.* n. s. [Fr. corbeau.] A raven, still so called in the north of England, and in the heraldic vocabulary.

COR.† n. s. [cor, Welsh; chorda, Latin; corde, French.]

1. A rope; a string composed of several strands or twists.

She let them down by a cord through the window. Jos. ii. 5.
Form'd of the finest complicated thread,
These num'rous cords are through the body spread.

Blackmore.

2. The cords extended in setting up tents, furnish several metaphors in scripture.

Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; none of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. Isaiah, xxxiii. 20.

3. A quantity of wood for fuel, supposed to be measured with a cord; a pile eight feet long, four high, and four broad. [corde de bois, Cotgrave.]

An oak growing lately in a copse of my lord Craven's, yielded—twenty-three cord of fire-wood. Evelyn, iii. 3. § 18.

COR-MAKER. n. s. [cord and make.] One whose trade is to make ropes; a ropemaker.

COR-WOOD. n. s. [cord and wood.] Wood piled up for fuel, to be sold by the cord.

To COR.† v. a. [from the noun.] To bind with ropes; to fasten with cords: to close by a bandage. Corded; twisted as a cord; bound with a cord.

Cotgrave in F. Cordé.

CO'RDAGE. n. s. [from cord.] A quantity of cords; the ropes of a ship.

Our cordage from her store, and cables should be made,
Of any in that kind most fit for marine trade. Drayton.

They fastened their ships, and rid at anchor with cables of iron chains, having neither canvas nor cordage. Raleigh.

Spain furnished a sort of rush called spartum, useful for cordage and other parts of shipping. Arbuthnot on Coins.

CO'RDED. adj. [from cord.] Made of ropes.

This night he meaneth, with a corded ladder,
To climb celestial Silvia's chamber-window. Shakespeare.

CORDELLIER. n. s. A Franciscan friar; so named from the cord which serves him for a cincture.

And whp to assist but a grave cordelier. Prior.

COR'DIAL.† n. s. [old Fr. cordial, from cor, the heart, Latin.]

1. A medicine that increases the force of the heart, or quickens the circulation.

2. Any medicine that increases strength.

A cordial, properly speaking, is not always what increaseth the force of the heart; for, by increasing that, the animal may be weakened, as in inflammatory diseases. Whatever increaseth the natural or animal strength, the force of moving the fluids and muscles, is a cordial: these are such substances as bring the serum of the blood into the proper condition for circulation and nutrition; as broths made of animal substances, milk, ripe fruits, and whatever is endued with a wholesome but not pungent taste. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Any thing that comforts, gladdens, and exhilarates.

Then with some cordials seek for to appease

The inward languor of my wounded heart,

And then my body shall have shortly ease;

But such sweet cordials pass physicians art. Spenser.

Cordials of pity give me now,

For I too weak for purges grow. Cowley.

Your warrior offspring that upheld the crown,

The scarlet honour of your penceful gown,

Are the most pleasing object I can find,

Charms to my sight, and cordials to my mind. Dryden.

COR'DIAL. adj.

1. Reviving; invigorating; restorative.

It is a thing I make; which hath the king

Five times redeem'd from death: I do not know

What is more cordial. Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

He only took cordial waters, in which we infused sometimes purgatives. Wiseman, Surgery.

2. Sincere; hearty; proceeding from the heart; without hypocrisy.

Doctrines are infused among Christians, which are apt to obstruct or intercept the cordial superstructing of Christian life of renovation, where the foundation is duly laid. Hammond.

He with looks of cordial love,

Hung over her enamour'd.

Milton, P. L.

COR'DIALITY.† n. s. [old Fr. cordialité.]

1. Relation to the heart.

That the antients had any such respects of cordiality, or reference unto the heart, will much be doubted. Brown.

2. Sincerity; freedom from hypocrisy.

COR'DIALLY.† adv. [from cordial.] Sincerely; heartily; without hypocrisy.

Against which church Christ exhibits no complaint at all, but loves her, and likes her entirely, even as he is cordially loved of her. More, Essays, of the Seven Churches, p. 131.

Where a strong inveterate love of sin has made any doctrine or proposition, wholly unsuitable to the heart, no argument or demonstration, nor miracle whatsoever, shall be able to bring the heart cordially to close with and receive it.

South, Sermon.

We should really, cordially, and sincerely love God.

Scott, Disc. xxi.

COR'DIALNESS.* n. s. [from cordial.] Heartiness.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

COR'DINER. n. s. [cordonnier, Fr.] A shoemaker.

It is so used in divers statutes.

CORDON. n. s. [Fr.] In fortification, a row of stones jutting out before the rampart and the basis of the parapet. Chambers.

CORDON.* n. s. [Fr.] A band; a wreath.

Which pardon is since enlarged, by Sixtus the fourth and fifth, to all lay brethren and sisters that did wear St. Francis's cordons. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

CORDOVA'N.* n. s. [old Fr. cordouan, cordowan. See CORDWAIN.] Spanish leather.

C O R

Whilst every shepherd's boy
Puts on his lusty green, with gaudy hook,
And hanging scrip of finest cordovan.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

No Roman perfumes, buffs, or cordovans.

Howell, Lett. Poem to the King, 1641.

CORDWAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. cordwan; old Eng. cordwane. Chaucer's Sir Topas has "shoon of cordwane." This word was formerly used for a dry hide. Its origin is from Cordova in Spain; the leather there prepared being called Cordovan leather; and all leather since, prepared in a similar manner, has obtained the same name.] Spanish leather.

Her straight legs most bravely were embay'd

In golden buskins of costly cordwan.

Spenser, F. Q.

Buskins he wore of costliest cordwayne.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. ii. 6.

CO'RDWAINER.† n. s. [Uncertain whether from Cordovan, Spanish leather, or from cord, of which shoes were formerly made, and are now used in the Spanish West Indies. Trevoux. The old French has cordwanier; so that Mr. Pegge's remark, in his Anecdotes of the English Language, that "cordwainer, usually supposed to have taken the name from Cordovan leather, of which the finest shoes were made perhaps in France, where the operator probably obtained the name of cordwanier, [is] easily corrupted into our cordwainer;" — is of little value.] A shoemaker.

If the shoe be too big for the foot, it is but troublesome and useless; and how poor an answer would it be of the cordwainer to say, that he had leather good store!

Bp. Hall, Balm of Gilead.

CORE.† n. s. [caur, Fr. cor, Lat.]

1. The heart.

Give me that man

That is not passion's slave, and I will wear him

In my heart's core; ay, in my heart of heart.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

2. The inner part of any thing.

In the core of the square she raised a tower of a furlong high.

Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

Dig out the cores below the surface. Mortimer, Husbandry.

They wasteful eat,

Through buds and bark, into the blacken'd core. Thomson.

3. The inner part of a fruit which contains the kernels.

It is reported that trees, watered perpetually with water, will make a fruit with little or no core or stone. Bacon.

4. The matter contained in a boil or sore.

I lance the sore,

And cut the head; for, 'till the core be found,

The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground. Dryden, Virgil.

5. It is used by Bacon for a body or collection [from corps, French: pronounced core.]

He was more doubtful of the raising of forces to resist the rebels, than of the resistance itself; for that he was in a core of people whose affections he suspected. Bacon, Hen. VII.

6. A disorder incident to sheep, occasioned by worms in their livers.

Chambers.

CORE'GENT.* n. s. [from con and regent.] A joint regent or governor.

Joseph was emperor of Germany, as well as co-regent of Hungary and Bohemia. Wrazall's Berlin, ii. 435.

CORE'LATIVE.* adj. [from con and relative. See CORRELATIVE.] Having a reciprocal relation.

Prepositions are the words which express relation considered in the same manner, in concrete with the co-relative object.

A. Smith, on the Format. of Languages.

CORIA'CEOUS. adj. [coriaceus, Latin.]

C O R

1. Consisting of leather.

2. Of a substance resembling leather.

A stronger projectile motion of the blood must occasion greater secretions and loss of liquid parts, and from thence, perhaps spissitude and coriaceous concretions.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

CORIA'NDER. n. s. [coriandrum, Latin.] A plant.

The species are, 1. Greater coriander. 2. Smaller testiculated coriander. The first is cultivated for the seeds, which are used in medicine: the second sort is seldom found.

Miller.

Israel called the name thereof manna; and it was, like coriander seed, white. Exod. xiii. 31.

CORINTH. n. s. [from the city of that name in Greece.] A small fruit commonly called currant.

Now will the corinths, now the rasps supply

Delicious draughts.

Phillips.

The chief riches of Zant consist in corinths, which the inhabitants have in great quantities. Broom.

CORINTHIAN Order, is generally reckoned the fourth, but by some the fifth, of the five orders of architecture; and is the most noble, rich and delicate of them all. Vitruvius ascribes it to Callimachus, a Corinthian sculptor, who is said to have taken the hint by passing by the tomb of a young lady, over which a basket with some of her playthings had been placed by her nurse, and covered with a tile; the whole having been placed over a root of acanthus. As it sprung up, the branches encompassed the basket; but arriving at the tile, bent downwards under the corners of it, forming a kind of a volute. Hence Callimachus imitated the basket by the vase of his capital, the tile in the abacus, and the leaves in the volute. Villalpandus imagines the Corinthian capital to have taken its original from an order in the temple of Solomon, whose leaves were those of the palm-tree. The capital is adorned with two rows of leaves, between which little stalks arise, of which the sixteen volutes are formed, which support the abacus.

Harris.

Behind these figures are large columns of the Corinthian Order, adorned with fruit and flowers. Dryden.

CORINTHIAN.* adj. Relating to the licentious manners of Corinth. See the substantive.

On searching for me at the bordello's, where, it may be, he has lost himself, and raps up, without pity, the sage and rheumatick old prelatess, with all her young Corinthian laity, to enquire for such an one. Milton, Apol. for Smeathman.

CORINTHIAN.* n. s.

1. One of those at Corinth, to whom St. Paul addressed two Epistles.

O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. 2 Cor. vi. 11.

2. In allusion to the notorious licentiousness of Corinth, "to play the Corinthian" was in elder times an expression denoting a profligate person; and in the same sense passed into our vulgar language.

I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian; a lad of mettle. Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. I.

To act the Corinthian, is, to commit fornication, according to Hesychius. Potter, Antiq. of Greece, ii. 12.

CORIVAL.* n. s. [from con and rival. See CORIVAL.] A rival.

The pope of Rome is, according to his last challenge and pretences, become a competitor and corival with the king for the hearts and alienations of the people.

Bacon, Charge at the Sess. for the Verge.

To COR'VAL.* v. a. [from the noun.] To affect to equal.

Where's then the saucy boat,
Whose weak untimber'd sides but even now
Corioll'd greatness? Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

CORK. n. s. [cortex, Lat. korek, Dutch.

*Hic dies, anno redeunte, festus
Corticem astrictum pice dimovebit
Amplogre fenum bibere instituta*

Consule Tullo. Hor.]

1. A glandiferous tree, in all respects like the ilex, excepting the bark, which, in the cork tree, is thick, spongy, and soft. Miller.

The cork tree grows near the Pyrenean hills, and in several parts of Italy, and the North of New England. Mortimer.

2. The bark of the cork tree used for stopples, or burnt into Spanish black. It is taken off without injury to the tree.

3. A piece of cork cut for the stopple of a bottle or barrel.

I prythee take the cork out of thy mouth, that I may drink thy tidings. Shakspeare, As you like it.

Be sure, may very sure, thy cork be good;
Then future ages shall of Peggy tell,
That nymph that brew'd and bottled ale so well. King.
Nor stop, for one bad cork, his butler's pay. Pope.

To CORK.* v. a. [from the noun.] To stop or raise with corks. Sherwood.

Ho that weareth a corked shoe or slipper. Holcut.
And tread on corked stilt, a prisoner's pace.

Bp. Hall, Sat. iv. 6.

CO'RKING-PIN. n. s. A pin of the largest size.

When you put a clean pillow-case on your lady's pillow, be sure to fasten it well with three corking-pins, that it may not fall off in the night. Swift, Direct. to the Chambermaid.

CO'RKY.† adj. [from cork.] Consisting of cork; resembling cork.

Bind fast his corky arms. Shakspeare, K. Lear.
[He] hath fully valued the weight of his general guilts, each, of which hath lead enough to sink the most corky, vain, fluctuating, proud, stubborn heart in the world.

Hammond's Works, iv. 644.

CO'RMORANT.† n. s. [cormoran, Fr. from corvus marinus, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. Others, from corvus vorans. But corman being the old French name of this bird, which is termed the greedy fowl, and after which a glutton is called a cormorant, the etymology may belong perhaps to gourmand, whence gourman, gorman, corman.]

1. A bird that preys upon fish. It is nearly of the bigness of a capon, with a wry bill and broad feet, black on his body, but greenish about his wings. He is eminently greedy and rapacious.

Let fame, that all hunt after in their lives,
Live register'd upon our brazen tombs;
When, spite of cormorant devouring time,
Th' endeavour of this present breath may buy
That honour which shall bate his scythe's keen edge.

Shakspeare.

Those called birds of prey, as the eagle, hawk, puttock, and cormorant. Peacham on Drawing.

Thence up he flew, and on the tree of life
Sat like a cormorant. Milton, P. L.

Not far from thence is seen a lake, the haunt
Of coots, and of the fishing cormorant. Dryden, Fub.

2. A glutton.

CORN.† n. s. [kaurno, Goth. corn, Sax. korh, Germ. It is found in all the Teutonick dialects; as, in an old Runick rhyme, Flagul er kaldastir corna.

•Hail is the coldest grain.]

1. The seeds which grow in ears, not in pods; such as are made into bread.

Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone. John, xii. 25.

The people cry you mock'd them; and, of late,
When corn was given them gratis, you repin'd. Shakspeare.

2. Grain yet unthreshed, standing in the field upon its stalk.

All the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Landing his men, he burnt the corn all thereabouts, which was now almost ripe. Knoles, Hist. of the Turks.

Still a murmur runs

Along the soft inclining fields of corn. Thomson, Autumn.

3. Grain in the ear, yet unthreshed.

Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season. Job, v. 26.

4. Any minute particle.

That art which hath reckoned how many corns of sand would make up a world. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

When I was cut in shreds thou,

And not a corn of powder left to bless us.

Beaumont, and Fl. Knight of Malta.

5. An excrescence on the feet, hard and painful; probably so called from its form, though by some supposed to be denominated from its cornaceous or horny substance.

Ladies, that have your feet
Unplagu'd with corns, we'll have a bout with you. Shakspeare.

The man that makes his toe,
What he his heart should make,

Shall of a corn cry woe,
And turn his sleep to wake. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Even in men, aches and hurts, and corns do engrave either towards rain or towards frost. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The hardest part of the corn is usually in the middle, thrusting itself in a nail; whence it has the Latin appellation of clavis. Wiseman's Surgery.

He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretold the gathering rain. Gay, Past.

It looks as there were regular accumulations and gatherings of humours growing perhaps in some people as corns. Arbuthnot.

Thus Lamb, renown'd for cutting corns,
An offer'd fee from Radeliff scorn'd. Swift.

To CORN.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To salt; to sprinkle with salt. The word is so used, as Skinner observes, by the old Saxons.

2. To granulate.

A runner, when the sieve is moved, by its weight and motion, forces the powder through the upper sieve; and that corns it. Hist. of Gunpowder, Sprat's Hist. R. S. p. 281.

Our careful Monarch stands in person by,
His new-cast cannon's firmness to explore;
The strength of big-corn'd powder loves to try,
And ball and cartridge, sorts for every bore.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.

CORN-BIND.* n. s. Climbing buck-wheat; also corn-convolvulus. North. Grose.

CORN-CRAIK.* n. s. [corn, and creak; Welsh crech, a shriek.] The land-rail, so called in the north of England; probably from its constant note, craik, craik.

CORN-FIELD. n. s. A field where corn is growing.

It was a lover and his lass,
That o'er the green corn-field did pass.

Shakspeare, As you like it.

You may soon enjoy the gallant sights of armies, encampments, and standards waving over your brother's cornfields. Pope.

CORN-FLAG. n. s. [corn and flag.] A plant.

Miller enumerates eleven species of this plant, some with red flowers, and some with white.

CORN-FLOOR. n. s. The floor where corn is stored.
Thou hast loved a reward upon every corn-floor. Hof. ix. 1.

CORN-FLOWER. n. s. [from corn and flower.]
There be certain corn-flowers, which come seldom or never in other places, unless they be set, but only amongst corn; as the blue-bottle, a kind of yellow marygold, will poppy, and furnitory. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Corn-flowers are of many sorts: some of them flower in June and July, and others in August. The seeds should be sown in March; they require a good soil. Mortimer.

CORN-HEAP.* n. s. Store of corn.
What if in his chaff he find but one untruth, whiles I in my corn-heap can find more?
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Mass. Clergy, p. 195.

CORN-LAND. n. s. [from corn and land.] Land appropriated to the production of grain.
Pasture and meadows are of such advantage to husbandry, that many prefer them to corn-lands. Mortimer; Husbandry.

CORN-MASTER. n. s. [from corn and master.] One that cultivates corn for sale. Not in use.
I knew a nobleman in England, that had the greatest audits of any man in my time; a great grasier, a great sheep-master, a great timberman, a great collier, a great corn-master, and a great leadman. Bacon.

CORN-LOFT.* n. s. Granary. [Fr. grenier.]
Sherwood.

CORN-MARIGOLD. n. s. [from corn and marigold.] A flower.

CORN-METER.* n. s. One who superintends the measure of corn.

CORN-MILL. n. s. [from corn and mill.] A mill to grind corn into meal.
Save the more laborious work of beating of hemp, by making the axle-tree of the corn-mills longer than ordinary, and placing pins in it to raise large hammers. Mortimer.

CORN-PIPE. n. s. [from corn and pipe.] A pipe made by slitting the joint of a green stalk of corn.
Now the shrill corn-pipes, echoing loud to arms,
To rank and file reduce the straggling swarms. Tickel.

CORN-ROCKET. n. s. [from corn and rocket.] A plant.

CORN-ROSE.* n. s. A species of poppy. See COQUELICOT.

CORN-SALLAD. n. s. [from corn and sallad.]
Corn-sallad is an herb, whose top-leaves are a sallot of themselves. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CORN-VIOLET.* n. s. A species of campanula.

CO'RNAGE.* n. s. [old Fr. cornage, from cornu, Lat.] A tenure which obliges the landholder to give notice of an invasion by blowing a horn.
The barony of Burgh on the Sands in Com. Cumbria, with divers other manors and lands in that county, were anciently held by the service of cornage, i. e. to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived. Blount, Anc. Tenures.

CO'RNAMUTE. n. s. [probably the same as cornemuse, which see.] A wind instrument.
The hoboy, sagbut deepe, recorder, and the flute:
Even from the shrillest shawme unto the cornamute.
Drayton, Polyolb. S. 4.
The musick was composed of treble violins, with all the inward parts, base viol, base lute, sagbut, cornamute, and a tabor and pipe. Browne, Inn. Temple Masque.

CO'RNCHANDLER.* n. s. [from corn and chandler, Dr. Johnson says; but this is an awkward combination, chandler or candle-seller having no connection with corn. The word may be a corruption of chaland, a customer unto a merchant; chalandise, trading unto one ship. Cotgrave.] One that retails corn.

CO'RN-CUTTER. n. s. [from corn and cut.] A man whose profession is to extirpate corns from the foot.

The nail was not loose, nor did seem to press into the flesh; for there had been a corn-cutter, who had cured it. Wiseman.
I have known a corn-cutter, who, with a right education, would have been an excellent physician. Spectator, No. 307.

CO'RNA.* n. s. [Lat.] The horny coat of the eye.
We are not so idle as to see objects always in their true place, nor so as to see them precisely in the direction of the rays, when they fall upon the cornea. Reid's Inquiry.

CO'RNEL.* n. s. [old Fr. earnille, cornie; } modern, cornouiller, from cornus, CO'RNELIAN-TREE. } Lat. The Italians call the fruit of this tree corniola.]
The cornel-tree beareth the fruit commonly called the cornel or cornelian cherry, as well from the name of the tree as the cornelian stone, the colour whereof it somewhat represents. The wood is very durable, and useful for wheelwork. Mortimer.
Take a service-tree, or a cornelian-tree, or an elder-tree, which we know have fruits of harsh and binding juice, and set them near a vine or fig-tree, and see whether the grapes or figs will not be the sweeter. Baron, Nat. Hist.

A huntress issuing from the wood,
Reclining on her cornel spear she stood. Dryden.
Mean time the goddess, in disdain bestows
The mast and acorn, brutal food! and strows
The fruits of cornel, as they feast around. Pope, Odyssey.
On wildings and on strawberries they fed;
Cornels and brambleberries gave the rest,
And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast. Dryden, Ovid.

CO'RNELIAN STONE. See CARNELIAN.

CO'RNEMUSE.* n. s. [French.] A kind of rustick flute, Dr. Johnson says. It is the bag-pipe, as used by Chaucer; but according to French authors is a shawm.

CO'RNEOUS. adj. [cornuus, Lat.] Horny; of a substance resembling horn.
Such as have corneous or horny eyes, as lobsters, and crustaceous animals, are generally dim-sighted. Brown.
The various submarine shrubs are of a corneous or lignous constitution, consisting chiefly of a fibrous matter. Woodward.

CORNER.* n. s. [cornel, Welsh; cornier, French, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps from the Lat. cornu, which is a corner as well as a horn; like the Goth. hauru. But the Syr. karnah also is a corner.]
1. An angle; a place inclosed by two walls or lines, which would intersect each other, if drawn beyond the point where they meet.
2. A secret or remote place.
There's nothing I have done yet, o' my conscience, Deserves a corner. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.
It is better to dwell in a corner of a house top, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house. Proverbs, xxv. 24.
I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner. Acts, xxvi. 26.
All the inhabitants, in every corner of the island, have been absolutely reduced under his immediate subjection. Davies.
Those vices that lurk in the secret corners of the soul. Addison.

3. The extremities; the utmost limit: thus every corner is the whole or every part.
Might I but through my prison, once a day,
Behold this maid, all corners else o' the earth
Let liberty make use of. Shakspeare, Tempest.
I turn'd, and try'd each corner of my bed,
To find if sleep were there, but sleep was lost. Dryden.

CORNER-STONE. n. s. [corner and stone.] The stone that unites the two walls at the corner; the principal stone.
See you yond' coin o' th' capitol, yond' corner-stone?
Shakspeare.
A mason was fitting a corner-stone. Howell, Voc. Pop.

CORNER-TEETH of a Horse are the four teeth between the middling teeth and the tushes; two above and two below, on each side of the jaw, which shoot when the horse is four years and a half old.

CORNERED.* adj. [from corner.] Farrier's Dict. Having angles or corners.

For as a corner'd christal spot,
My heart diaphanous was not,
But solid stuffe. Longlace, Luc. P. p. 29.
Whether this building were square like a castle, or corner'd like a triangle, or round like a tower.

CORNERWISE.† adv. [corner and wise.] Diagonally; with the corner in front. Hulot, and Sherwood.

CORNET.† n. s. [cornette, French.]

1. A musical instrument blown with the mouth: used anciently in war, probably in the cavalry.

Israel played before the Lord on psalteries and on timbrels, and on cornets. 2 Sam. vi. 5.

Other wind instruments require a forcible breath; as trumpets, cornets, and hunters horns. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear,
Under an actor's nose, he's never near. Dryden, Juv.

2. A company or troop of horse; perhaps as many as had a cornet belonging to them. This sense is now disused.

These noblemen were appointed with some cornets of horse and bands of foot, to put themselves beyond the hill where the rebels were encamped. Bacon.

Seventy great horses lay dead in the field, and one cornet was taken. Hayward.

They discerned a body of five cornets of horse very full, standing in very good order to receive them. Clarendon.

3. The officer that bears the standard of a troop; derived by some from coronet, which, it is said, such officers formerly wore; by others, with greater probability, from the flag or standard which this officer carries: and which is named in our old poetry; by others from cornu, the wing of an army. See the next sense.

Non-commissioned officers are all those below ensigns and cornets. Ld. Chesterfield.

4. A standard or flag; "the ensign of a horse company," cornette. Cotgrave.

In his white cornet Verdon doth display
A fret of gules. Drayton, Barons' Wars, ii. 24.

5. CORNET of a Horse, is the lowest part of his pastern that runs round the coffin, and is distinguished by the hair that joins and covers the upper part of the hoof. Farrier's Dict.

6. A scarf anciently worn by doctors; "a doctor's tippet." Cotgrave.

7. A head-dress; "a bongrace, used in old time, and at this day, by some old women." Cotgrave.

8. A CORNET of Paper, is described by Skinner to be a cap of paper, made by retailers for small wares; and by Cotgrave, the cornet or coffin of paper wherein a grocer makes up his retailed, parcel of spice.

CORNETCY.* n. s. [from cornet.] The commission of a cornet.

The army was his original destination; and a cornetcy of horse his first and only commission in it. Ld. Chesterfield.

CORNETER. n. s. [from cornet.] A blower of the cornet.

So great was the rabble of trumpeters, corneters, and other musicians, that even Claudius himself might have heard them. Hakewill, on Providence.

CORNICÉ.† n. s. [corniche, Fr. xogavis, Gr. the summit. This word is often pronounced cornish, and indeed is so written in our old lexicography.] The highest projection of a wall or column.

The cornice of the Palazzo Fornese, which makes so beautiful an effect below, when viewed more nearly, will be found not to have its just measures. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

The walls were massy brass, the cornice high,
Blue metals crown'd, in colours of the sky. Pope, Odyssey.

CORNICÉ Ring. [In gunnery.] The next ring from the muzzle backwards. Chambers.

CORNICLE. n. s. [from cornu, Latin.] A little horn.

There will be found on either side two black filaments, or membranous strings, which extend unto the long and shorter cornicle, upon protrusion. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CORNICULATÉ.† adj. [from cornu, Lat.]

1. A term in botany.

Corniculate plants are such as produce many distinct and horned pods; and corniculate flowers are such hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of spur, or little horn. Chambers.

2. Horned.

Venus, moon-like, grows corniculate,
What time her face with flusher light is blown.

Mora, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 62.

CORNICÉ. adj. [from cornu and facio, Latin.]

Productive of horns; making horns. Dict.

CORNICEROUS. adj. [corniger, Latin.] Horned; Having horns.

Nature, in other cornigerous animals, hath placed the horns higher, and reclining; as in bucks. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CORNING-HOUSE.* n. s. The place where gunpowder is granulated. See to CORN.

From the mill the powder is brought to the corning-house.

Hist. of Gunpowder, Sprat's Hist. R. S. p. 281.

CORNISH.* n. s. The people of Cornwall.

The Cornish here in Britain, have now, it seems, entirely lost the original language of their country; and must, if they desire to know the significations of the names of families, places, &c. come over to Wales to learn them.

Richards, Welsh Dict. Pref.

We find the Welsh and Cornish, as one people, often uniting themselves as in a national cause against the Saxons.

Watson, Hist. E. P. i. Diss. 1.

CORNISH.* adj. Relating to the language or manners of the Cornish. Some remains of this language were met with in Cornwall, so lately as in the year 1768, notwithstanding what is said by Richards in 1753. See Archæolog. iii.

From the Archæologia I took the Cornish, Irish, and many of the Armorick words. Richards, Welsh Dict. Pref.

A Cornish hug is a term used in wrestling, when one has an adversary on his breast, and holds him there. Chambers.

CORNUCOPIA. n. s. [Lat.] The horn of plenty; a horn topped with fruits and flowers in the hands of a goddess.

To CORNUTE.† v. a. [cornutus, Latin.] To bestow horns; to cuckold.

A lawyer's wife in Aristænetus threatened to cornute him.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 605.

CORNU'TED.† adj. [cornutus, Latin.] Grafted with horns; horned; cuckolded.

I do not stand upon the matter of being a cuckold; for there's many a brave fellow lives in Cuckold's-Row. But why does he not name others as well as me; as if the horn grew upon nobody's head but mine: I am sure, there are others that better deserve it; I hope he cannot say that ever I gored any of my superiors, or that my being cornuted has raised the price of posthorns, lanthorns, or pocket-inkhorns!

L'Estrange, Tr. of Quevedo's Visions.

CORNU'TO. n. s. [from cornutus, Lat.] A man horned; a cuckold.

The peaking cornuto her husband, dwelling in a continual larum of jealousy. Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

CORNU'ROU.* n. s. [from cornute.] He who makes a cuckold.

He that thinks every man is his wife's suitor,
Defiles his bed, and proves his own cornutor.

Jordan, Poems, 2. b.

CO'RNRY.† adj. [from cornu, horn, Latin.]

1. Strong or hard like horn; horny.

[The rain] downward gan to rave,

And drown'd the corny ranks,

Liste, Tr. of Du Bart. (1627) p. 14.

Up stood the corny reed

Embattel'd in her field.

Milton, P. L.

2. [from corn.] Producing grain or corn.

Tell me why the ant,

Midst summer's plenty thinks of winter's want,

By constant journeys, careful to prepare

Her stores; and bringing home the corny ear.

Prior.

3. Containing corn; this is a very old sense of the word, to which may be added, what has escaped Dr. Johnson, but what most Englishmen will approve, Chaucer's draught of corny ale," Pardoner's Tale; i. e. containing plenty of corn or malt.

They lodge in habitations not their own,

By their high crops and corny gizzards known.

Dryden.

COROLLARY. n. s. [corollarium, Lat. from corolla; fnis coronat opus; corollaire, Fr.]

1. The conclusion: A corollary seems to be a conclusion; whether following from the premises necessarily or not.

Now since we have considered the malignity of this sin of detraction, it is but a natural corollary, that we enforce our vigilance against it.

Gor. of the Tongue.

As a corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others, I owe somewhat to myself.

Dryden, Pub. Pref.

2. Surplus.

Bring a corollary,

Rather than want.

Shakspeare, Tempest.

CORONA. n. s. [Latin.] A large flat member of the cornice, so called because it crowns the entablature and the whole order. It is called by workmen the drip.

Chambers.

In a cornice the gola or cymatium of the corona, the coping, the modillions or dentelli, make a noble shew by their graceful projections.

Spectator.

CO'RONAL.† n. s. [old Fr. coronal, a coronet, from corona, Lat.] A crown; a garland.

Crown ye God Bacchus with a coronal,

And Hymen also crown with wreaths of vine.

Spenser.

Now no more shall these smooth brows be begirt,

With youthful coronals, and lead the dance.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

CO'RONAL.† adj. [coronal, Fr. "commisure coronale, the coronal suture, or seam, which compasses the forehead, &c." Cotgrave.] Belonging to the top of the head.

A man of about forty-five years of age came to me, with a round tubercle between the sagittal and coronal suture.

Wiseman.

CO'RONARY.† adj. [coronarius Latin.]

1. Relating to a crown; seated on the top of the head like a crown.

The basilisk of older times was a proper kind of serpent, not above three palms long, as some account; and differenced from other serpents by advancing his head, and some white marks, or coronary spots upon the crown.

Brown.

The coronary thorns did not only express the scorn of the imposters, by that figure into which they were contrived; but did pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of pains, by their numerous acuminations.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix.

The catalogue of coronary plants is not large in Theophrastus, Pliny, &c.

Sir T. Brown, Musc. Tr. p. 93.

2. It is applied in anatomy to arteries, which are fancied to encompass the heart in the manner of a garland.

The substance of the heart itself is most certainly made and nourished by the blood, which is conveyed to it by the coronary arteries.

Bentley, Sermon.

CORONATION. n. s. [from corona, Lat.]

1. The act or solemnity of crowning a king.

Fortune smiling at her work therein, that a scaffold of execution should grow a scaffold of coronation.

Sidney.

Willingly I came to Denmark,

To shew my duty in your coronation.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

A cough, sir, which I caught with ringing in the king's affairs upon his coronation day.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Now empress fame had publish'd the renown

Of Shadwell's coronation through the town.

Dryden, Macflecknoe.

2. The pomp or assembly present at a coronation.

In pensive thought recall the fancied scene,

See coronations rise on every green.

Pope.

CO'RONEL.* n. s. [Spanish. See COLONEL.] A colonel.

Their coronels, named Don Sebastian, came forth to entreat that they might part with their arms like soldiers.

Spenser on Ireland

CO'RONER. n. s. [from corona.] An officer whose duty is to enquire, on the part of the king, how any violent death was occasioned; for which purpose a jury is impannelled.

Go thou and seek the coroner, and let him sit o' my uncle; for he's in the third degree of drink; he's drowned.

Shakspeare.

CO'RONET. n. s. [coronetta, Ital. the diminutive of corona, a crown.]

1. An inferior crown worn by the nobility. The coronet of a duke is adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis has leaves with pearls interposed; that of an earl raises the pearls above the leaves; that of a viscount is surrounded with only pearls; that of a baron has only four pearls.

In his livery

Wak'd crowns and coronets, realms and islands were

As plates dropt from his pocket.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleopatra.

All the rest are countesses.

— Their coronets say so.

Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Nor could our nobles hope their bold attempt,

Who ruin'd crowns, would coronets exempt.

Dryden.

Peers and dukes, and all their sweeping train,

And garters, stars, and coronets appear.

Pope.

2. An ornamental head-dress, in poetical language.

The rest was drawn into a coronet of gold, richly set with pearl.

Sidney.

Under a coronet his flowing hair,

In curls, on either cheek play'd.

Milton, P. L.

CO'RPORAL. n. s. [corrupted from caporal, French.]

The lowest officer of the infantry, whose office is to place and remove the sentinels.

The cruel corporal whisper'd in my ear,

Five pounds, if rightly tipt, would set me clear.

Gay.

CO'RPORAL of a Ship. An officer that hath the charge of setting the watches and sentries, and relieving them; who sees that all the soldiers and sailors keep their arms neat and clean, and teaches them how to use them. He has a mate under him.

Harris.

CO'RPORAL.* n. s. [Fr. corporail; low Lat. corporale.]

"The corporal; the fine linen, wherein the sacrament is put." Cotgrave. See CORPORAS.

When all have communicated, the minister is directed to return to the Lord's table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth; which by the ancient writers and the Scotch liturgy is called the corporal, from its being spread over the body or consecrated bread. Wheally on the Common Prayer.

CORPORAL.† adj. [from corporel, Fr. corpus, Latin.]

1. Relating to the body; belonging to the body.

To relief of lazars and weak age.

Of indigent faint souls, past corporal toil.

A hundred alm-houses, right well supplied. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Render to me some corporal sign about her.

More evident than this.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

That God hath been otherwise seen, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding. Raleigh.

Beasts enjoy greater sensual pleasures, and feel fewer corporal pains, and are utter strangers to all those anxious and tormenting thoughts, which perpetually haunt and disquiet mankind. Atterbury.

2. Material; not spiritual. In the present language, when body is used philosophically in opposition to spirit, the word corporeal is used, as a corporeal being; but otherwise corporal. Corporeal is having a body; corporal relating to the body. This distinction seems not ancient. Corporeous was formerly used for corporeal.

Whither are they vanish'd?

Into the air: and what seem'd corporeal

Melted, as breath, into the wind. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

And from these corporeal nutriments, perhaps,

Your bodies may at last turn all to spirit. Milton, P. L.

3. Relating to an oath so called.

The phrase Corporeal oath, is supposed to have been derived—not from the touching the New Testament, or the bodily act of kissing it, but from the antient use of touching the corporeale, or cloth which covered the consecrated elements. Brand, Pop. Antig.

CORPORALITY.† n. s. [from corporal.]

1. The quality of being embodied.

If this light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality; and if it have any corporality, then, of all other, the most subtle and pure. Raleigh's Hist.

The corporality of the soul, you know, was taught only by one or two men. Clarke, Letter to Dodwell, p. 77.

2. Corporation; confraternity.

Processes to be served by a corporality of griffonlike promoters and apparitors. Milton, of Ref. in Eng. B. 1.

CORPORALLY.† adv. [from corporal.] Bodily.

They [the Papists] say, that the very natural fleshe and blood of Christ, which suffered for us upon the crosse and sitteth at the right hand of the Father in heaven, is also really, substantially, corporally, and naturally, in or under the accidentes of the sacramental bread and wyne, which they call the formes of bread and wyne. Abp. Cramer, Def. fol. 16.

The sun is corporally conjoined with basiliscus. Brown.

Sons in six things are bound to their parents, whether they be alive or dead: First, they are bound to serve them corporally, to wit, with their own body. Sir. M. Savlys, Ess. (1634.) p. 154.

CORPORATE. adj. [from corpus, Latin.]

1. United in a body or community; enabled to act in legal processes as an individual.

Breaking forth like a sudden tempest, he over-run all Munster and Connaught, defacing and utterly subverting all corporate towns that were not strongly walled. Spenser on Ireland.

The nobles of Athens being not at this time a corporate assembly, therefore the resentment of the commons was usually turned against particular persons. Swift.

2. General; united.

They answer in a joint and corporate voice, That now they are at fall. Shakspeare, Timon.

CORPORAS.* n. s. The old name of the corporal, or companion cloth. See CORPORAL.

Her manyfold kyndes of ornaments; as, her corpes, corporasses, chesibles, &c. Bale on the Revel. k. 6. b.

They [the subdeacons] must provide water against mass, wash the palls and corporas-cloths. Dering on the Hebrews, ch. 5.

To CORPORATE.* v. n. [from the adj.] To unite.

Though she [the soul] corporate

With no world yet, by a just Nemesis

Kept off from all; yet she, thus separate,

May oft be struck with potent rays transmiss

From divers worlds.

More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 19.

CORPORATELY.* adv. [from corporate.] In a corporate capacity; unitedly.

CORPORATENESS. n. s. [from corporate.] The state of a body corporate; a community. Dict.

CORPORATION. n. s. [from corpus, Latin.]

A corporation is a body politick, authorized by the king's charter to have a common seal, one head officer or more, and members, able, by their common consent, to grant or receive, in law, any thing within the compass of their charter: even as one man may do by law all things, that by law he is not forbidden; and bindeth the successors, as a single man binds his executor or heir. Cowel.

Of angels we are not to consider only what they are, and do, in regard of their own being; but that also which concerneth them, as they are linked into a kind of corporation amongst themselves, and of society with men. Hooker, i. § 4.

Of this we find some foot-steps in our law,

Which doth her root from God and nature take;

Ten thousand men she doth together draw,

And of them all one corporation make.

Darwin.

CORPORATURE.† n. s. [from corpus, Latin.] The state of being embodied.

That antiquate, secure,

And easy, dull conceit of corporature,

Of matter, quantity, &c.

More, Song of the Soul, App.

CORPOREAL. adj. [from corpus, Latin.]

1. Having a body, not immaterial; not spiritual.

See CORPORAL.

The swiftness of those circles attribute,

Though numberless, to his omnipotence,

That to corporeal substances could add

Speed almost spiritual.

Milton, P. L.

Having surveyed the image of God in the soul, we are not to omit those characters that God imprinted upon the body, as much as a spiritual substance could be pictured upon a corporeal. South, Sermons.

God being supposed to be a pure spirit, cannot be the object of any corporeal sense. Tillotson.

The course is finish'd which thy fates decreed,

And thou from thy corporeal prison freed.

Dryden, Fab.

Fix thy corporeal and internal eye

On the young gnat, or new-engender'd fly.

Prior.

2. It is used by Swift inaccurately for corporeal.

I am not in a condition to make a true step even on Aimsbury Downs; and I declare, that a corporeal false step is worse than a political one. Swift.

CORPOREALIST.* n. s. [from corporeal.] One who denies spiritual substances.

If the matters of fact be too notorious to be gainsaid, then these corporealists will not stick to affirm with a late author, that they believe there are many thousands of spirits, made of an incorporeal matter, too fine to be perceived by the senses of men. Hallywell, Melampus. (1681.) p. 3.

I believe it will puzzle the wisest corporealists to tell us how that, which is immaterial, can either be produced out of matter, or lodged in matter as its subject.

Sherlock, Immortal, of the Soul, i. § 2.

Some corporealists and mechanics vainly pretended to make a world without a God. Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 259.

CORPOREALLY.* adv. [from corporeal.] In a material or bodily manner.

This, and other phrases, are to be understood not corporeally, but spiritually.

Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655.) p. 251.

CORPOREITY. n. s. [from corporeus, Latin.] Materiality; the quality of being embodied; the state of having a body; bodiliness.

Since philosophy affirmeth, that we are iniddle substances between the soul and the body, they must admit of some corporeity which supposeth weight or gravity. Brown.

It is the saying of divine Plato, that man is nature's horizon, dividing betwixt the upper hemisphere of immaterial intellects and this lower of corporeity. Glanville's Scep sis.

The one attributed corporeity to God, and the other shape and figure. Stillingfleet.

CORPOREOUS.* adj. [Lat. corporeous.] Bodily: having a body.

Worshipped in so many corporeous shapes.

Hammond, of Conscience.

A second hindrance was the grossness and earthiness of their fancy, which was not able to conceive God to be any thing but a corporeous substance. Hammond's Works, iv. 641.

CORPORIFICATION. n. s. [from corporify.] The act of giving body or palpability.

TO CORPORIFY. v. a. [from corpus, Lat.] To embody; to insissate into body. Not used.

A certain spirituous substance, extracted out of it, is mistaken for the spirit of the world corporified. Boyle.

CO'RPUSANT, or CO'RPUSANSE.* [corrupted from the Spanish cuervo santo, i. e. holy body.] A word used by mariners to denote those luminous bodies, which sometimes skip about the masts and yards of ships; an ignis fatuus; and what the ancients called Castor and Pollux. See Shaw's Travels, 4to. p. 334.

CORPS.† } n. s. [corps, Fr. corpus, Latin.]

CORPSE. }

1. A body.

That lewd ribauld

Laid first his filthy hands on virgin cleene,
To spoil her dainty corse, so fair and sheene,
Of chastity and honour virginal.

Spenser.

2. A body, in contempt.

Though pleasant, all too little seems

• Te stuff this maw, this vast unhide-bound corps. Milton, P. L.

He looks as man was made, with face erect,

• That scorns his brittle corps, and seems as dead
He's not all spirit. Dryden, Don Sebast.

3. A carcass; a dead body; a corse.

Not a friend greet

My poor corps, where my bones shall be thrown. Shakespeare.

There was the murder'd corps in covert laid,

And violent death in thousand shapes display'd. Dryden, Fob.

See where the corps of thy dead son approaches. Addison.

The corps was laid out upon the floor by the emperor's command: he then bid every one light his flambeau, and stand about the dead body. Addison, Guardian.

4. The body, in opposition to the soul.

Cold numbness streight bereaves

Her corps of sense, and the air her soul receives. Denham.

5. A body of forces.

6. The land with which a prebend, or other ecclesiastical office, is endowed.

The prebendaries, over and above their reserved rents, have a corps, and receive fines upon renewals.

Bacon, Liber Regis, p. 133.

CORPS DE GARDE.* n. s. [Fr.] A guard-room.

See COURT OF GUARD.

False pastors, whom a man shall find rather in their beds, or at table, or in the stews, or any where else than in their corps de gard. Harmer, Tr. of Beza's Sermon (1587), p. 334.

To save ourselves, we were fain to take shelter in the corps de guard, till a lodging was provided for us.

Brown's Travels, (1687), p. 49.

CO'RPULENCE. } n. s. [corpulentia, Latin.]

CO'RPULENCY. }

1. Bulkiness of body; fleshiness; fulness of flesh.

To what a cumbersome unwieldiness,

And burdalous corpulence my love had grown. Don't.

It is but one species of corpulency; for there may be bulk without fat, from the great quantity of muscular flesh, the case of robust people. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Spissitude; grossness of matter.

The muscular flesh serves for the vibration of the tail, the heaviness and corpulency of the water requiring a great force to divide it. Ray on the Creation.

CO'RPULENT. adj. [corpulentus, Latin.] Fleishy; bulky; having great bodily bulk.

We say it is a fleshy stile, when there is much periphrases, and circuit of words; and when with more than enough, it grows fat and corpulent. Bacon, Discoveries.

Excess of nourishment is hurtful; for it maketh the child corpulent, and growing in breadth rather than in height.

Bacon.

CORPUSCLE. n. s. [corpusculum, Lat.] A small body; a particle of matter; an atom; a little fragment.

It will add much to our satisfaction, if those corpuscles can be discovered with microscopes. Newton, Opt.

Who knows what are the figures of the little corpuscles that compose and distinguish different bodies? Watts, Logic.

CORPU'SCULAR. } adj. [from corpusculum, Lat.]

CORPUSCULARIAN. } Relating to bodies; comprising bodies. It is the distinguishing epithet of that philosophy which attempts the rational solution of all physical appearances by the action of one body upon another.

As to natural philosophy I do not expect to see any principles proposed, more comprehensive and intelligible than the corpuscularian or mechanical. Boyle.

The mechanical or corpuscular philosophy, though peradventure the oldest, as well as the best in the world, had lain buried for many ages in contempt and oblivion.

Bulley, Sermon, iv.

CORPUSCULARIAN.* n. s. [from the adj.] A corpuscularian philosopher.

This may be said, that the modern corpuscularians talk, in most things, more intelligibly than the peripateticks. Bentley.

He [Newton] seems to have made a greater progress, than all the sects of corpuscularians together had done before him.

Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 245.

CO'RRACLE.? See CORRICLE. Dr. Johnson says.

But no such word is in his dictionary. It is perhaps intended for coracle, which was formerly written with the double r. "Corrack, a little round skill of oziars, covered with raw hides." Sherwood. See CORACLE.

TO CORRA'DE.† v. a. [corrado, Latin.] This verb, though given by Dr. Johnson without any authority, and wearing the appearance of his own coinage, is of ancient date in our language, being in the vocabulary of Cockeram, and there defined "to rake, shave, or scrape." To rub off; to wear away by frequent rubbing; to scrape together.

CORRADIA'TION.† n. s. [con and radius, Lat.] A conjunction of rays in one point.

The impression of colour worketh not but by a cone of direct beams, or right lines, whereof the basis is in the object, and the vertical point in the eye; so as there is a corradiaion, and conjunction of beams. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The conjunction and corradiaion, in that place of heaven, of the sun with the four stars of the first magnitude.

Bacon on the Union of Eng. and Scotland.

TO CORRE'CT. v. a. [corrigo, correctum, Latin.]

1. To punish; to chastise; to discipline.

Sad accidents, and a state of affliction, is a school of virtue; it corrects levity, and interrupts the confidence of sinning.

Bp. Taylor.

After he has once been corrected for a lie, you must be sure never after to pardon it in him. Locke on Education.

Children being to be restrained by the parents only in vicious things, a look or nod only ought to correct them, when they do amiss. Locke on Education.

2. To amend; to take away faults, in writings, life, or things.

This is a defect in the first make of some men's minds, which can scarce ever be corrected afterwards, either by learning or age.

Burnet, Theory, Pref.

Correcting Nature, from what actually she is in individuals, to what she ought to be, and what she was created.

Dryden.

I writ, because it amused me; I corrected, because it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write.

Pope, Pref.

The mind may cool, and be at leisure to attend to its domestic concern: to consider what habit wants to be corrected, and what inclination to be subdued.

Rogers.

3. To obviate the qualities of one ingredient by another, or by any method of preparation.

O happy mixture wherein things contrary do so qualify and correct the one the danger of the other's excess, that neither boldness can make us presume as long as we are kept under with the sense of our own wretchedness, nor while we trust in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus, fear be able to tyrannize over us.

Hocker.

As in habitual gout or stone,
The only thing that can be done,
Is to correct your drink and diet,
And keep the inward foe in quiet.

Prior.

In cases of acidity, water is the proper drink: its quality of relaxing may be corrected by boiling it with some animal substances; as ivory or hartshorn.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. To remark faults.

CORRECT. adj. [correctus, Latin.] Revised or finished with exactness; free from faults.

What verse can do, he has perform'd in this,
Which he presumes the most correct of his.

Dryden, Aur. Prof.

Always use the most correct editions: various readings will be only troublesome where the sense is complete.

Fellon.

CORRECTION. n. s. [from correct.]

1. Punishment; discipline; chastisement; penalty.

Wilt thou, pupil like,

Take thy correction mildly, kiss the rod?

Shakspeare, Rich. II.

An offensive wife,

That hath carag'd him on to offer strokes,

As he is striking, holds his infant up,

And hang; resolv'd correction in the arm

That was uprear'd to execution.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

We are all but children here under the great master of the family; and he is pleased, by hopes and fears, by mercies and corrections, to instruct us in virtue.

Watts.

One fault was too great lenity to her servants, to whom she gave good counsel, but too gentle correction.

Arbuthnot.

2. Alteration to a better state; the act of taking away faults; amendment.

Another poet, in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if, at least, they live long enough to deserve correction.

Dryden, Fab. Pref.

3. That which is substituted in the place of any thing wrong.

Corrections or improvements should be adjoined, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places.

Watts.

4. Reprehension; animadversion.

They proceed with judgement and ingenuity, establishing their assertions not only with great solidity, but submitting them also unto the correction of future discovery.

Brown.

5. Abatement of noxious qualities, by the addition of something contrary.

To make ambitious, wholesome, do not take
A dram of country's dulness; do not add
Corrections, but as chymists purge the bad.

Donne.

CORRECTIONER. n. s. [from correction.] One that has been in the house of correction; a jail-bird.

This seems to be the meaning in Shakspeare.

I will have you soundly swinged for this, you blue-bottle rogue! you filthy fannish correctioner.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

CORRECTIVE. † adj. [from correct.] Having the power to alter or obviate any bad qualities.

The law of nations alloweth, and ever hath done, masters over their servants not only a directive but a corrective and coactive power.

Brewster on the Sab. p. 14.

Have any of these — any corrective power of any one member of the house?

Bp. Maiton, Episc. Asserted, p. 137.

Mulberries are pectoral, corrective of bilious aculi.

Arbuthnot.

2. Having the power to limit.

To prevent this folly, the Platonist interposeth a caution in this corrective article, "Yea, happy?" It hath the force of a revocation, whereby he seems to retract what went before, not simply and absolutely, but in a certain degree, lest worldly men should wrest it to a misinterpretation.

Dr. Hobbesworth, Sermon at Cambridge, (1642.) p. 27.

CORRECTIVE. n. s.

1. That which has the power of altering or obviating any thing amiss.

The hair, wool, feathers, and scales, which all animals of prey do swallow, are a seasonable and necessary corrective, to prevent their greediness from filling themselves with too succulent a food.

Ray on the Creation.

Humanly speaking, and according to the method of the world, and the little correctives supplied by art and discipline, it seldom fails; but an ill principle has its course, and nature makes good its blow.

South, Sermons.

2. Limitation: restriction.

There seems to be such an instance in the regiment, which the human soul exerciseth in relation, to the body, that with certain correctives and exceptions, may give some kind of explanation or adumbration thereof.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CORRECTLY. adv. [from correct.] Accurately; exactly; without faults.

There are ladies, without knowing what tenses and particles, adverbs and prepositions are, speak as properly and as correctly as most gentlemen who have been bred up in the ordinary methods of grammar schools.

Locke on Education.

Such days as neither ebb nor flow,

Correctly cold, and regularly low.

Pope, Ess. on Criticism.

CORRECTNESS. n. s. [from correct.] Accuracy; exactness; freedom from faults.

Too much labour often takes away the spirit, by adding to the polishing; so that there remains nothing but a dull correctness, a piece without any considerable faults, but with few beauties.

Dryden, Dufresnoy.

The softness of the flesh, the delicacy of the shape, air and posture, and the correctness of design in this statue, are inexpressible.

Addison on Italy.

Late, very late, correctness grew our care,

When the fir'd nation breath'd from civil war.

Pope.

Those pieces have never before been printed from the true copies, or with any tolerable degree of correctness.

Swift.

CORRECTOR. † n. s. [from correct; and old Fr. correcteur.] Our word is sometimes written correcter.]

1. He that amends, or alters, by punishment or animadversion.

Wherefore, said he to the corrector, until he utterly do cease of his presumption and obstinacy, look that thou still beat him.

Sir T. Elgot, Gor. fol. 189. b.

How many does zeal urge rather to do justice on some sins, than to forbear all sin? How many rather to be correctors than practisers of religion.

Sprat, Sermons.

With all his faults he sets up to be an universal reformer and corrector of abuses, and a remover of grievances.

Swift.

2. He that revises any thing to free it from faults; as the corrector of the press, that amends the errors committed in printing.

He is by country, an Englishman; by birth, a gentleman; by education, a scholar; afterwards, a corrector of the common law print, with M. Tottle the printer.

Proceedings against Garnet, (1606.) sign. T. i. b.

I had been at Louvain and Antwerp to take some depositions for the discovering of the authours and correctors of that most pernicious libel, Corona Regia.

Tribunal to the Sec. of State, 1619. Cabot. p. 151.

Friar Manrique commandeth all that passage to be blotted out: But the Roman correctors clap this note upon the margin for an antidote.

Abp. Usher, Answ. to the Jesuit Malone, p. 77.

The compositors and correcters, of negligence, or set purpose, have altered many sentences, words, and letters, without reason or authority.

James on the Corruption of Scripture, &c. (1688,) p. 523.

I remember a person, who, by his style and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge press in Little Britain, proceeding gradually to an author. Swift.

3. In medicine.

Such an ingredient in a composition, as guards against or abates the force of another; as the lixivial salts prevent the grievous vellications of resinous purges, by dividing their particles, and preventing their adhesion to the intestinal membranes, and as spices and carminative seeds assist the operation of some catharticks, by dissipating wind. In making a medicine, such a thing is called a corrector which destroys or diminishes a quality that could not otherwise be dispensed with: thus turpentine is correctors of quicksilver, by destroying its fluxility, and making it capable of mixture. Quincy.

CORREGIDOR.* n. s. [Spanish; low Lat. corrigedarius, from corrigere.] A Spanish magistrate.

This noble was processioned by the arrival of the corregidor, followed by two alguazils and a guard, who, without any ceremony, entered the room where we were. Smollett, Gil Blas.

Te CORRELATE. v. n. [from con and relatus, Latin.] To have a reciprocal relation, as father and son.

CORRELATE. n. s. One that stands in the opposite relation.

It is one thing for a father to cease to be a father, by casting off his son; and another for him to cease to be so, by the death of his son: in this the relation is at an end, for want of a correlate. South.

CORRELATIVE. adj. [from con and relativus, Latin.] Having a reciprocal relation, so that the existence of one in a particular state depends upon the existence of another.

Father and son, husband and wife and such other correlative terms, seem nearly to belong one to another. South.

Giving is a relative action, and so requires a correlative to answer it: giving, on one part, transfers no property, unless there be an accepting on the other. South.

CORRELATIVE.* n. s. [from the adj.] That which has a reciprocal relation.

By what ever method one man gains an estate, by that same method, or its correlative, another has lost it. Blackstone.

CORRELATIVENESS. n. s. [from correlative.] The state of being correlative.

CORREPTION.* n. s. [correptio, Latin.] Objurgation; chiding; reprehension; reproof.

That I use all mildness or mansuetude in admonishing; the angry passionate correption being rather apt to provoke, than to amend. Hammond of Fraternal Admon. or Correption, § 15.

His clarity of fraternal correption having only this caution or restraint, the hearer's interest. Felt, Life of Hammond, § 2.

If we must be talking of other people's faults, let it not be to defame, but to amend them, by converting our detraction into admonition and fraternal correption. Gov. of Tongue.

To CORRESPOND.* v. n. [Fr. correspondre, from con and respondeo, Latin.]

1. To suit; to answer; to be proportionate; to be adequate to; to be adapted to; to fit.

The days, if one be compared with another successively throughout the year, are found not to be equal, and will not justly correspond with any artificial or mechanical equal measures of time. Holder on Time.

Words being but empty sounds, any farther than they are signs of our ideas, we cannot but assent to them, as they correspond to those ideas we have, but no farther than that. Locke.

2. To keep up commerce with another by alternate letters.

CORRESPONDENCE.* n. s. [old Fr. correspondance.]
CORRESPONDENCY.

1. Relation; reciprocal adaptation of one thing to another.

Between the law of their heavenly operations, and the actions of men in this our state of mortality, such correspondence there is as maketh it expedient to know in some sort the one, for the others more perfect direction. Hooker, b. i.

Whatever we fancy, things keep their course; and their habitudes, correspondencies, and relations keep the same to one another. Locke.

2. Intercourse; reciprocal intelligence.

I had discovered those unlawful correspondencies they had used, and engagements they had made to embroil my kingdoms. King Charles.

Sure the villains hold a correspondence With the enemy, and thus they would betray us. Denham.

It happens very oddly, that the pope and I should have the same thought much about the same time: my enemies will be apt to say, that we hold a correspondence together, and act by concert in this matter. Addison, Guard. No. 116.

3. Friendship; interchange of offices or civilities.

Let such military persons be assured, that I am reputed of, rather than factious and popular; holding also good correspondence with the other great men in the state. Bacon, Ess. 17.

CORRESPONDENT.* adj. [Fr. correspondant.] Suitable; adapted; agreeable; answerable.

What good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work, according to the law which himself hath eternally purposed to keep. Hooker.

And as five zones th' ethereal regions bind, Five correspondent are to earth assigned. Dryden, Oeal.

CORRESPONDENT. n. s. One with whom intelligence or commerce is kept up by mutual messages or letters.

He was pleased to command me to send to him, and receive from him all his letters from and to all his correspondents at home and abroad. Denham, Dedication.

CORRESPONDENTLY.* adv. [from correspondent.] In an according manner.

He terms the episcopal power of excommunication, the apostolical rod; and correspondently he calls Damasus, a bishop, his shepherd; and himself, a presbyter, his sheep. Bp. Merton, Episc. Asserted, p. 28.

CORRESPONSIVE. adj. [from correspond.] Answerable; adapted to any thing.

Priam's six gates of the city, with massy staples, And responsive and fulfilling bolts, Sperre up the sons of Troy. Shakespeare, Tro. and Crest.

CORRIDOR. n. s. [French.]

1. [In fortification.] The covert way lying round the whole compass of the fortifications of a place.

2. [In architecture.] A gallery or long isle round about a building, leading to several chambers at a distance from each other. Harris.

There is something very noble in the amphitheatre, though the high wall and corridors that went round it are almost entirely ruined. Addison on Italy.

CoRRIGIBLE.* adj. [Fr. corrigeable, from corrigo, Latin.]

1. Capable of being altered or amended.

A satire should expose nothing but what is corrigible. Addison, Spect. No. 209.

2. Deserving of punishment; punishable.

He was taken up very short, and adjudged corrigible for such presumptuous language. Howell, Vocal Forbear.

3. Corrective; having the power to correct. Not proper, nor used, Dr. Johnson says, citing only Shakspeare. It may not be proper, but it is certainly used.

Our bodies are our gardens, to the which our wills are gardeners; so that, if we will either have it steril with idleness, or manured with industry, the power and cognizable authority of this lies in our will. Shakspeare, Othello.

Do I not beat a reasonable corrective hand over him, Crispinus? B. Johnson, Poetaster.

- CORRU'VAL.† n. s. [con and ival.] 'Rival; competitor.

They had governours commonly out of the two families of the Geraldines and Butlers, both adversaries and corruvals one against the other. Spenser on Ireland.

He that doth redeem her thence, might wear Without corruval all her dignities. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Others both just and wise, and Solomon among the rest, if they may not hate and forsake as Moses enjoins, and the gospel imports, will find it impossible not to love otherwise than will sort with the love of God, whose jealousy brooks no corruval. Milton, Doctrines and Discipline of Divorce.

- CORRU'VAL. adj. Contending.

Not thinking, perhaps, that this would be to erect a power equal and corruval with that of God.

Bp. Fleetwood, Ess. on Miracles.

- To CORRU'VAL. v. n. [from the noun.] 'To vie with.

A Starre which to the night no service lends,
Nor on the ever-changing Moone attends;
But with the Sunne corruvalling in light,
Shines more by day than other stars by night.

Fitz-geffry, Blessed Birthday, p. 46.

- CORRU'VALRY.† n. s. [from corruval.] Competition; opposition.

To reproach the Roman church for this idolatrous corruvalry, or rather prelation, of the Virgin in religious worship before Christ. More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, (1669,) Pref.

- CORRU'VALSHIP. n. s. [from corruval.] Opposition; rivalry.

By the corruvalship of Shagad his false friend, Rustau was destroyed. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 149.

- CORRO'BORANT. adj. [from corroborate.] Having the power to give strength.

There be divers sorts of bracelets fit to comfort the spirits, and they be of three intentions, refrigerant, corroborant, and aperient. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

- To CORRO'BORATE. v. a. [corroboro, Latin.]

1. To confirm; to establish.

Machiavel well noteth, though in an ill-favoured instance, there is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words, except it be corroborate by custom. Bacon.

2. To strengthen; to make strong.

To fortify imagination there be three ways; the authority whence the belief is derived, means to quicken and corroborate the imagination, and means to repeat it and refresh it. Bacon.

It was said that the prince himself had, by the sight of foreign courts, and observations on the different natures of people, and rules of government, much excited and awaked his spirits, and corroborated his judgement. Wolton.

As any limb well and duly exercised grows stronger, the nerves of the body are corroborated thereby. Watts.

- CORRO'BORATE. adj. [Lat. corroboratus.] Strengthened; confirmed; established.

There is no trusting to the force of nature, nor to the bravery of words; except it be corroborate by custom.

Bacon, Ess. 39.

Wherever kingdoms and states have been united, and that union corroborate by the bond of mutual naturalization, you shall never perceive them afterwards—to break and sever again. Bacon, Speech on the Nat. of the Scot. Nation.

- CORROBORATION.† n. s. [from corroborate.] 'The act of strengthening or confirming; confirmation by some additional security; addition of strength.

The most renowned doctors of Christ's religion, in the corroboratio of their arguments and sentences, do allege the same histories. Sir T. Elgot, Gov. fol. 207. b.

The Lady herself procured a bull, for the better corroboratio of the marriage. Bacon, Hen. VIII.

Something of a the bishop of Durham noted, out of the Gospel of St. Matthew, for the imposition of hands upon children. The conclusion was, for the fuller explanation, (that we make it not a sacrament, or a corroboratio to a former sacrament,) that it should be considered of by their lordships, whether it might not, without alteration, (whereof his Majesty was still very wary) be intitled an Examination with a Confirmation. Harleian Court Conference, (1603,) p. 11.

- CORROBORATIVE.† n. s. [from corroborate.] 'That which increases strength.

Like an apothecary's shop, wherein are remedies—alteratives, corroboratives, lenitives, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 279.

In the cure of an ulcer, with a moist intemperies, as the heart is weakened by too much humidity, you are to mix corroboratives of an astringent faculty; and the ulcer also requireth to be dried. Wiscman, Surgery.

- CORROBORATIVE. adj. Having the power of confirming or establishing.

If you think there be any thing explanatory or corroborative of what I say in the beginning of my book, be so good to transcribe those passages for me. Warburton to Hurd, L. 17.

- To CORRODE. v. a. [corrodo, Lat.] 'To eat away by degrees, as a menstruum; to prey upon; to consume; to wear away gradually.

Statesmen purge vice with vice, and may corrode

The bad with bad, a spider with a toad;

For so ill thralls not them, but they tame ill,

And make her do much good against her will. Donne.

We know that aqua-fortis corroding copper, which is it that gives the colour to verdigrease, is wont to reduce it to a green blue solution. Boyle on Colours.

The nature of mankind, left to itself, would soon have fallen into dissolution, without the incessant and corroding invasions of so long a time. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Hannibal the Pyreneans past,
And steepy Alps, the mounds that nature cast,
And with corroding juices, as he went,

A passage through the living rock he rent. Dryden, Jun.

Fishes, which neither chew their meat nor grind it in their stomachs, do, by a dissolvent liquor there provided, corrode and reduce it into a chylus. Ray on the Creation.

The blood turning acrimonious corrodes the vessels, producing almost all the diseases of the inflammatory kind. Abuthaot.

Should jealousy its venom once diffuse,

Corroding every thought, and blasting all

Love's paradise. Thomson, Spring.

- CORRO'DENT. adj. [from corrode.] Having the power of corroding or wasting any thing away.

- CORRO'DENT. n. s. 'That which eats away, or preys upon.

The physick of that good Samaritan in the Gospel, wherein there was a corrodent and a lenient, compunction and consolation. Bp. of London's Vine Palatine, (1614,) p. 17.

- To CORRO'DIATE. v. a. [from corrode.] 'To eat away by degrees, as a menstruum.

Styx is a fountain of Arcadia, whose waters are so deadly, that they presently kill whatsoever drinks thereof; so corrodiating that they can only be contained in the hoof of a mule.

Sandys, Christ's Pass. Notes, p. 95.

CORRODIBILITY. n. s. [from corrodible.] The quality of being corrosible; possibility to be consumed by a menstruum.

CORRODIBLE. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed or corroded.

Metals, although corrodible by waters, yet will not suffer a liquation from the powerfulllest heat communicable unto that element.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CORRODY. n. s. [from corrodo, Lat.] A defalcation from an allowance or salary for some other than the original purpose.

Besides these floating burgeses of the ocean, there are certain flying citizens of the air, which prescribe for a corrody therein.

Carew.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

CORROSIBLE. adj. [from corrode.] Possible to be consumed by a menstruum, this ought to be corrodible.

CORROSIBLENESS. n. s. [from corrosible.] Susceptibility of corrosion, rather corrodibility.

Diet.

CORROSION. n. s. [from corrosion, Fr.] The power of eating or wearing away by degrees.

Corrosion is a particular species of dissolution of bodies, either by an acid, or a saline menstruum. It is almost wholly designed for the resolution of bodies most strongly compacted, as bones and metals; so that the menstruum here employed, have a considerable moment or force. These liquors, whether acid or urinous, are nothing but salts dissolved in a little phlegm; therefore these being solid, and consequently containing a considerable quantity of matter, do both attract one another more, and are also more attracted by the particles of the body to be dissolved; so when the more solid bodies are put into saline menstrua, the attraction is stronger than in other solutions; and the motion, which is always proportional to the attraction, is more violent: so that we may easily conceive, when the motion is in such a manner increased, it should drive the salts into the pores of the bodies, and open and loosen their cohesion, though ever so firm.

Quincy.

A kind of poison worketh either by corrosion, or by a secret malignity and enmity to nature.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

That corrosion and dissolution of bodies, even the most solid and durable, which is vulgarly ascribed to the air, is caused merely by the action of water upon them; the air being so far from injuring and preying upon the bodies it environs, that it contributes to their security and preservation.

Woodward.

CORROSIVE. † adj. [old Fr. corrosif, from corrodo, Lat.] It was anciently pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, now indifferently.]

1. Having the power of consuming or wearing away.

The soft delicious air,

To heal the scar of these corrosive fires,

Shall breathe her calm.

Milton, P. L. ii. 401.

Gold, after it has been divided by corrosive liquors into invisible parts, yet may presently be precipitated, so as to appear again in its own form.

Grew, Cosmol. Sacra.

The sacred sons of vengeance, on whose course

Corrosive famine waits, and kills the year.

Thomson, Spring.

2. Having the quality to fret or vex.

CORROSIVE. † n. s. [This substantive was sometimes written corrive; probably from the circumstance of the accent being then on the first syllable, which thus easily abbreviated the word.]

1. That which has the quality of wasting any thing away, as the flesh of an ulcer.

He meant his corrosives to apply,

And with strict diet taune his stubborn malady.

Spenser, F. Q.

2. That which has the power of fretting, or of giving pain.

And that same bitter corrive, which did eat

His tender heart.

"We have corruptly contracted most names, both of men and places. Camden, Rem.

CORRUPTNESS. n. s. [from corrupt.] The quality of corruption; putrescence; vice.

CORRUPTRESS.* n. s. [old Fr. corruptrice.] She that misleads or corrupts others.

Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

Peace, thou rude bawd!
 Thou studied old corruptress, tye thy tongue up.

Beaum. and Fl. Wife for a Month.

CO'RSAIR.* n. s. [French, from the Ital. corsaro, of corso, or à corsibus, by reason of their excursions.]

1. A pirate; one who professes to scour the sea, and 'seize merchants.

They are much infested by corsaires, or free-booters, under the colours of Leghorn, Malta, &c.

Ricaut, State of the Greek Ch. p. 356.

2. The vessel of a corsair; as, a Barbary corsair; an Algerine corsair.

CORSE.* n. s. [old Fr. cors, corse, a body.]

1. A body. Not in use.

For he was strong, and of so mighty corse,
 As ever wielded spear in warlike hand. Spenser, F. Q.

2. A dead body; a carcass: a poetical word.

That from her body, full of filthy sin,
 He reft her hateful head, without remorse;
 A stream of coal-black blood forth gushed from her corse.

Spenser, F. Q.

Set down the corse; or, by saint Paul,
 I'll make a corse of him that disobeys. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

What may this mean?

That thou, dead corse, again, in complete steel,
 Revisit'st thus the glimpses of the moon,
 Making night hideous? Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Here lay him down, my friends,
 Full in my sight, that I may view at leisure
 The bloody corse, and count those glorious wounds. Addison.

CORSE-PRESENT.* n. s. A funeral-present; a mortu-tuary.

It was anciently usual in this kingdom to bring the mortuary to church along with the corpse, when it came to be buried;
 and thence it is sometimes called a corse-present. Blackstone.

CO'RSELET. n. s. [corselet, Fr.] A light armour for the forepart of the body. *

Some shirts of maille, some coats of plate put on,
 Some don'd a cuirace, some a corselet bright. Marfax.

They lash, they foil, they pass, they strive to bore
 Their corselets, and their thinnest parts explor. Dryden.

But heroes who o'ercome or die,
 Have their hearts hung extremely high;
 The strings of which, in battle's heat,
 Against their very corselets beat. Prior.

TO CO'RSELET, or CO'RSLET.* v. a. [from the noun.]

To encircle, as with a corselet.

Her arms,

Able to lock Jove from a synod, shall
 By warranting moon-light corselet thee.

Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

CORSET.* n. s. [Fr.] A pair of boddices for a woman. The word is still in use. Cotgrave.

C O R

CORTEGE.* n. s. [French; perhaps from cortice, the ablative of cortex.] A train of attendants; as,
 "a cortège of coaches." Wiquefort's Ambass. p. 18.

CORTES.* n. s. [Spanish.] The states assembled in Madrid.

The following accounts, though short and imperfect, yet are sufficient to satisfy any person of the ancient Spanish cortes having been the same with the English parliament, and with the assembly of the states in France.

Geddes, View of the Cortes, Tracts, (1730,) i. 312.

CO'RTEx.* n. s. [Lat.] Bark; cover.

Which seeds by the help of microscopes are all found to be real and perfect plants, with leaves and trunk curiously folded up and enclosed in the cortex. Bradley, Sermon IV.

CORTICAL. adj. [cortex, bark, Lat.] Barky: belonging to the outer part; belonging to the rind; outward.

Their last extremities form a little gland, (all these little glands together make the cortical part of the brain) terminating in two little vessels. Cheyne, Phil. Prim.

CORTICATED. adj. [from corticatus, Lat.] Resembling the bark of a tree.

This animal is a kind of lizard, a quadruped corticated and depilous; that is, without wool, fur, or hair. Brown.

CORTICOSE. adj. [from corticosis, Lat.] Full of bark.
Dict.

CORVETTO. n. s. The curvet.

You must draw the horse in his career with his manage, and tug, doing the corvetto and leaping. Peacham on Drawing.

CORUSCANT.* adj. [corusco, Lat.] Glittering by flashes; flashing.

His praises are like those coruscant beams,
 Which Phoebus on high rocks of crystal streams.

Howell, Lett. iv. 49.

TO CORUSCATE.* v. n. [Lat. corusco.] To glitter.

As flaming fire was more coruscating and enlightening than any other matter, they invented lamps to hang in the sepulchres of the rich, which would burn perpetually.

Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 331.

CORUSCATION. n. s. [coruscatio, Lat.] Flash; quick vibration of light.

We see that lightnings and coruscations, which are near at hand, yield no sound. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

We may learn that sulphureous steams abound in the bowels of the earth, and ferment with minerals, and sometimes take fire with a sudden coruscation and explosion. Newton, Opt.

How heat and moisture mingle in a mass,
 Or belch in thunder, or in lightning blaze;
 Why nimble coruscations strike the eye,
 And bold tornadoes bluster in the sky. Garth, Dispos.

CORYBANTICK.* adj. [from Corybantes, the frantick priests of Cybele. The Greeks have adopted κορυβανται, and the French corybantier, to denote the action of a mad enthusiast.] Madly agitated or inflamed.

True divine zeal is no corybantick fury, but a calm and regular heat, guided and managed by light and prudence.

Cudworth, Sermon. p. 92.

When the evil spirit moves them to resist and overthrow,
 how full are they of the highest corybantick fury!

Fuller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 7.

CORYMBIATED. adj. [corymbus, Lat.] Garnished with branches of berries. Dict.

CORYMBIFEROUS. adj. [from corymbus and fero, Lat.]
 Bearing fruit or berries in bunches.

Corymbiferous plants are distinguished into such as have a radiate flower, as the sun-flower; and such as have a naked flower, as the hemp-agrimony, and mugwort: to which are added those a-kin hereunto, such as scabious, teasel, thistle, and the like. Quincy.

CORYMBUS. n. s. [Latin.]

Among the ancient botanists it was used to express the bunches or clusters of berries of ivy: amongst modern botanists it is used for a compounded discus flower, whose seeds are not pappous, or do not fly away in down; such are the flowers of daisies, and common marygold. Quincy.

CORYPHEUS. * n. s. [Lat. from the Gr. κορυφή, the top of the head. Fr. coryphée.] The principal of those who composed the chorus in the ancient tragedy; and the speaker for them. Hence the word has passed, in several languages, into a general name for a chief or principal of any company; and accordingly our language, nearly two centuries since, had "corypheus, or prime man." See Sherwood's Fr. and Eng. Dict. 1632. It is now sometimes applied to the leader or director of a band of musick.

COSCI'NOMANCY. n. s. [from κοσμίον, a sieve, and μαντις, divination.] The art of divination by means of a sieve. A very ancient practice mentioned by Theocritus, and still used in some parts of England, to find out persons unknown.

Chambers.

COSI'CANT. n. s. [In geometry.] The secant of an arch, which is the complement of another to ninety degrees.

Harris.

To CO'SEN. * See To COZEN.

CO'SHURING. n. s. [Irish.]

Coshurings were visitations and progresses made by the lord and his followers among his tenants; wherein he did eat them (as the English proverb is) out of house and home.

Davies.

CO'SHER. † n. s. [cousu, old Fr. from coudre, to sew.] A botcher; a tailor; or, according to Minsheu, a cobbler.

Do you make an alehouse of my lady's house, that ye squeak out your cosiers' catches, without any mitigation or remorse of voice?

Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

COSIGNIFICATIVE. * adj. [con and significative.] Having the same signification.

Cockeram.

CO'SINE. n. s. [In geometry.] The right sine of an arch, which is the complement of another to ninety degrees.

Harris.

COSMETICK. * n. s. [Fr. cosmétique, Gr. κοσμητικός, from κοσμέω, to adorn. The word is of no great age either in our own or the Fr. language. In the Fop's Dictionary of 1690, Cosmeticks are explained, as if the word was then not generally intelligible.] A preparation for improving beauty.

No better cosmeticks than a severe temperance and purity, modesty and humility, a gracious temper and calmness of spirit; no true beauty without the signatures of these graces in the very countenance.

Ray on the Creation.

Next, rose-check'd majesty, beyond compare

The best cosmetick of the virgin's face.

Edwards, Can. of Crit. Sonn. 36.

COSMETICK. † adj. Having the power of improving beauty; beautifying.

First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores,

With head uncover'd, the cosmetick powers.

Pope.

He [Plot] seems to be most happily employed, when he is learnedly debating on tautological echoes, fanciful petrifications, subterraneous snails, undescribed thunderbolts, cosmetick clay, the altitude of giants, uncommonly prolific cases of Oxfordshire women and cows, pregnancies of extraordinary duration, children crying in the womb yet portending no misfortune, prophetic dreams, knockings before death, capricious devils, amulets against witchcraft, stags without antlers, and rams with six horns.

Warton, Hist. of Killington, Pref.

COSMICAL. adj. [κόσμος.]

1. Relating to the world.

2. Rising or setting with the sun; not acronychal.

The cosmical ascension of a star we term that, when it riseth together with the sun, or in the same degree of the ecliptick wherein the sun abideth.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COSMICALLY. adv. [from cosmical.] With the sun; not acronychally.

From the rising of this star, not cosmically, that is, with the sun, but eliacally; that is, its emersion from the rays of the sun, the ancient computed their calendar days.

Brown.

COSMOGONIST. † n. s. [from cosmogony.] He who describes the creation of the world.

The relation seems in some measure to have been approved by the sacred cosmogonist himself; who in entering upon the important transaction of creation, or a universe rising into being at the efficacious fiat of its Maker, gives us his first general picture of it, under the two comprehensive distinctions of heaven and earth.

Coventry, End. to Hud. Conv. 3.

COSMOGONY. † n. s. [κόσμος, and γέννη.] The rise or birth of the world; the creation.

There are some bad books in that language [the Greek] relating to cosmogony, and amongst them a little piece of Ocellus Lucanus.

The Student, ii. 380.

The world is in its dotage, and yet the cosmogony or creation of the world has puzzled philosophers of all ages.

Goldsmith, Fear of Wakefield, ch. 14.

COSMOGEOGRAPHY. n. s. [κόσμος and γεῶγραφω.] One who writes a description of the world; distinct from geographer, who describes the situation of particular countries.

The ancient cosmographers do place the division of the East and Western hemisphere; that is, the first term of longitude in the Canary or Fortunate Islands, conceiving these parts the extremest habitations westward.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COSMOGRAPHICAL. † adj. [from cosmographical.] Relating to the general description of the world.

An old cosmographical poet.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

COSMOGRAPHICALLY. adv. [from cosmographical.] In a manner relating to the science by which the structure of the world is discovered and described.

The torrella, or spherical magnet, cosmographically set out with circles of the globe.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COSMOGRAPHY. † n. s. [κόσμος and γράφω.] The science of the general system or affections of the world, distinct from geography, which delivers the situation and boundaries of particular countries.

I never travelled but in map or card, in which mine unconfin'd thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of cosmography.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.

Here it might see the world without travel; it being a lesser scheme of the creation, nature contracted, a little cosmography, or map of the universe.

South.

COSMOPLASTICK. * adj. [κόσμος, the world, and πλαστικός, plastick.] Respecting the formation of the world.

The opinion of Seneca signifies little in this case, he bring no better than a cosmoplastick atheist, i. e. he made a certain plastick or spermatick nature, devoid of all animality or conscious intellectuality, to be the highest principle in the universe.

Hallywell, Melamp. (1681.) p. 84.

COSMOPOLITAN. † } n. s. [κόσμος and πολίτης, Fr. cos-

COSMOPOLITE. } mopolitain.] A citizen of the world; one who is at home in every place.

I came tumbling out into the world a pure cadet, a true cosmopolite; not born to land, lease, house, or office.

Howell, Lett. i. vi. 60.

Thus God and Nature taught their rude cosmopolite.

More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 122.

COSSACKS.* n. s. [the etymology of the word has given rise to various opinions. Some consider it as derived from the Polish kosa, or cosa, a goat; these persons imitating the agility as well as the wandering life of the animal. Others refer it to the Tartar language. "C'est à la langue Tartare 'qu' appartient le mot kosaque. Il signifie un guerrier armé à la légère." Hist. de la Russie par M. L'Eveque, tom. iv. p. 403. Others, to Chazakia, or the land of the chazaks, which formed a part of what is now Circassia, properly so called. Peyssonnel, Observ. sur les Peup. Barb. p. 125.] A people now inhabiting the Ukraine; and in military history, a body of soldiers serving under the Russian government, to which they belong; who have indeed often distinguished themselves, but never with so much valour and success as in contributing to the late overthrow of the most gigantic tyranny that ever trampled upon society, and disgraced human nature.

This upstart, strengthened with many Poles and Cossacks, appears in arms to claim his right out of the hands of Boris.

Milton, Hist. of Moscow.

CO'SSER.† n. s. [Ital. cassiccio, from casa, the house.] A lamb brought up without the dam. The term is applied to a calf, or colt. It is yet used in Norfolk and Suffolk.

And, if thou wilt bewaile my wofull teene,

I shall give thee yond cosset for thy payne.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.

Much greater gifts for guerdon thou shalt gain

Than kid or cosset.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Nov.

CO'SSICK.* adj. [cossa, Lat. "Algebra so called." Cambridge Dict. 1693.] Relating to algebra. Not now in use. "Cossike numbers," Recorde's Whetstone of Witte, 1557. Bp. Hall also uses the word, Rem. p. 367.

COST.† n. s. [kost, Dutch. As this word is found in the remotest Teutonic dialects, even in the Icelandick, it is not probably derived to us from the Latin custo; though it is not unlikely, that the French coster comes from the Latin.]

1. The price of any thing. [Sax. cýrt, Manning's Suppl. to Lye.]

2. Sumptuousness; luxury.

The city woman bears.

The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders.

Shakspeare.

Let foreign princes vainly boast

The rude effects of pride and cost

Of vaster fabricks, to which they Contribute nothing but the pay.

Waller.

3. Charge; expence.

While he found his daughter maintained without his cost, he was content to be deaf to any noise of infamy.

Sidney.

I shall never hold that upon my friend,

Whose tongue shall ask me for one penny cost,

To ransom home revolted Mortimer.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? or hath he given us any gift?

2 Sam. xix. 42.

And wilt thou, O cruel boast!

Put poor nature to such cost?

O! 'twill undo our common mother,

To be at charge of such another.

Crashaw.

It is strange to see any ecclesiastical pile, not by ecclesiastical cost and influence, rising above ground; especially in an age in which men's mouths are open against the church, but their hands shut towards it.

South, Serm.

He whose tale is best, and pleases most,

Should win his supper at our common cost.

Dryden, Fab.

Fourteen thousand pounds are paid by Wood for the purchase of his patent: what were his other visible costs I know not; what his late, is variously conjectured.

Swift.

4. Loss; fine; detriment.

I am what I am, and they that prove me shall find me to their cost: do you mark me neighbour, to their cost, I say.

Beaumont, and Fl. Cupid's Revenge.

What they had fondly wished, proved afterwards to their cost over true.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

COST.* n. s. [Fr. coste, Lat. costa. See COAST.] A rib, or side.

Between the costs of a ship.

B. Jonson, Staple of News.

To COST. v. n. pret. cost; particip. cost. [couster, Fr.]

To be bought for; to be had at a price.

The dagger and poison are always in readiness; but to bring the action to extremity, and then recover all, will require the art of a writer, and cost him many a pang.

Dryden.

CO'STAL.† adj. [Fr. costal, from the Lat. costa. See COST.] Belonging to the ribs.

Hereby are excluded all cetaceans and cartilaginous fishes, many pectinal, whose ribs are rectilinear; and many costal, which have their ribs embowed.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'STARD.† n. s. [from coster, a head, Dr. Johnson says; which is certainly found in composition with monger, meaning an apple-monger, or costard-monger; but neither in this or any other sense has he noticed coster; which Skinner, however, says, is an old word for the head.]

1. A head.

Take him over the costard with the hilt of thy sword.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

2. An apple round and bulky like the head.

The wilding, costard, then the well-known pomwater.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 18.

CO'STARD-MONGER.* n. s. [from costard and monger.]

A dealer in apples; a fruiterer.

Many country vicars are driven to shifts; and, if our greedy patrons hold us to such conditions, they will make us turn costard-mongers, grasiers, or sell ale.

Burton on Melchun.

Half-famished Tantalus is fallen to his fruit, with that appetite, as it threatens to undo the whole company of costard-mongers, and has a river afore him running excellent wine.

B. Jonson, Musques.

CO'STER-MONGER.* n. s. The same as costard-monger.

Poets had their Muses; orators, their Mercury; physicians, their Esculapius; gardeners their Flora; costermongers, their Pomona.

Pootherby, Athrom. p. 38.

He'll rail like a rude coster-monger.

Beaumont, and Fl. Scornful Lady.

CO'STIVE.† adj. [constipatus, Lat. constipē, Fr.]

1. Bound in the body; having the excretions obstructed.

When the passage of the gall becomes obstructed, the body grows costive, and the excrements of the belly white.

Brown.

While faster than his costive brain indites,

Philo's quick hand in flowing letters writes;

His case appears to me like honest Teague's,

When he was run away with by his legs.

Prior.

2. Close; impermeable.

Clay in dry seasons is costive, hardening with the sun and wind, till unlocked by industry, so as to admit of the air and heavenly influences.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. Cold; formal.

The costive liberality of a purseproud man insults the distresses it sometimes relieves.

Ld. Chesterfield.

You must be frank, but without indiscretion; and close, but without being costive.

Ibid.

CO'STIVENESS.† n. s. [from costive.]

1. The state of the body in which excretion is obstructed.

Costiveness disperses malign putrid fumes out of the guts and mesentery into all parts of the body, occasioning headaches, fevers, loss of appetite, and disturbance of concoction. Harvey.

Costiveness has ill effects, and is hard to be dealt with by physick; purging medicines rather increasing than removing the evil. Locke on Educat.

2. Coldness; stiffness.

In the literary and philosophical society at Manchester was once a reverend disputant of the same costiveness in publick elocation with myself. Wakefield, Mem. p. 216.

CO'STLESS.* adj. [cost and less.] Costing nothing; without expence.

I have known many, saith St. Basil, who have fasted, and prayed, and groaned, and expressed all sorts of costless piety; who yet would not part with a doit to the afflicted.

Barrow, i. Sermon. 31.

CO'STLINESS. n. s. [from costly.] Sumptuousness; expensiveness.

Though not with curious costliness, yet with cleanly sufficiency it entertained me. Sidney.

Nor have the frugaller sons of fortune any reason to object the costliness; since they frequently pay dearer for less advantageous pleasures. Glanville's Serpents.

CO'STLY. adj. [from cost.] Sumptuous; expensive; of a high price.

Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not exprest in fancy; rich, not gaudy;
For the apparel oft proclaims the man. Shakspeare, Ham.

Leave for a while thy costly country seat;
And to be great indeed, forget

The nauseous pleasures of the great. Dryden.
The chapel of St. Laurence will be perhaps the most costly piece of work on the earth, when completed. Addison.

He is here speaking of Paradise, which he represents as a most charming and delightful place; abounding with things not only useful and convenient, but even the most rare and valuable, the most costly and desirable. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CO'STMARY.* n. s. [costus, Latin.] An herb.

The scented camomile, the verdurous costmary.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 15.

CO'STREL. n. s. [supposed to be derived from costrel.] A bottle. Skinner.

COSTUME.* n. s. [Ital. costume; old Fr. costume; les contumes, floeurs, usages. V. Roquefort. Low Lat. custuma, old Eng. custume.] In painting, the strict observance of proper chaacter as to persons and things. It is now generally applied in the sense of custom or manners.

The cruzado was not current, as it should seem, at Venice, though it certainly was in England in the time of Shakspeare, who has here indulged his usual practice of departing from national costume. Douce, Illustr. of Shakspeare. ii. 270.

COSUFFERER.* n. s. [con and sufferer.] A fellow-sufferer.

Should no cosufferers commiserate.

Wycherly, Prolog. to Love in a Wood.

COSUPREME.* n. s. [con and supreme.] A partaker of supremity.

The phenix and the dove,
Co-supremes and stars of love. Shakspeare, Pass. Pilgrim.

COT. } At the end of the names of places, come
COTE. } generally from the Saxon cot, a cottage.

COAT. } Gibson.

COT.* n. s. [Goth kot, a little house; Welsh, cwt; Sax. cot and cote. Our own word is often written cote. The first example of cot which is in Dr. Johnson's dictionary, means a very different thing from a cottage. It is a boat. Cot, in our language has also another meaning, which has likewise escaped Dr. Johnson's notice. See Cor, a boat; and Cor, a bed.] A small house; a cottage; a hut; a mean habitation.

Besides, his cot, his flocks, and bounds of feed,
Are now on sale; and at our sheepcote now.

By reason of his absence, there is nothing
That you will feed on. Shakspeare, As you like it.

A stately temple shoots within the skies:
The crotchets of their cot in columns rise;
The pavement, polish'd marble they behold;
The gates with sculpture grac'd, the spires and tiles of gold.

As Jove vouchsaf'd on Ida's top, 'tis said,
At poor Philemon's cot to take a bed. Fenton.

COT, or COTT.* n. s. [old Fr. cote, coite; Gr. κοιτη, a bed.] A small bed; a cradle, as it is yet called in the north of England; and a hammock, as the sailors still call it.

Their beds are cots of two feet height, or four low posts strengthened with girth-web. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 314.
Lying upon a slight and low bedstead they [the Turks] call a cot, bottomed with broad girth-web made of cotton wool.

Terry, Voy. to the E. Ind. (1655.) p. 198.

COT, or COTT.* n. s. [low Lat. cota, a kind of ship. The passage from Spenser has been cited by Dr. Johnson as an illustration of cot for cottage.] A little boat.

Cymochles of her questioned
Both what she was, and what that usage ment,
Which in her cot she daily practized:—
Vaine man, said she:—
My little boat can safely pass this perilous bourne.

They call, in Ireland, cots, things like boats, but very unsapely, being nothing but square pieces of timber made hollow. G. Boute's Nat. Hist. of Ireland, p. 64.

COT.* n. s.

1. An abridgement of cotquean.

2. A cade-lamb.

Grose.

TO COTA'BULATE.* v. a. [See TO CONTABULATE. This word has the authority of our old lexicography.] To plank; to floor with boards. Cockeram.

COTA'NGENT. n. s. [In geometry.] The tangent of an arch which is the complement of another to ninety degrees. Harris.

COTE.* n. s. [Sax. See Cor.]

1. A cottage. The old orthography. Sherwood.
No sooner sat he foote within the late deformed cote,
But that the formal change of things his wondring eyes did note.

Warner, Albion's England, (1597.)

Not a swain

This night hath known his lodging here, or lain
Within these cotes. Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

2. A sheepfold.

Stalls for all manner of beasts, and cotes for flocks.

2 Chron. xxxii. 28.

The folded flock penn'd in their wattled cotes. Milton, Com.

TO COTE.* v. a. [perhaps from the Fr. coté, the side of any thing; de coté, sidelong.] This word, which I have found only in Chapman, seems to signify the same as to leave behind, to overpass. Dr. Johnson says. It is used by Shakspeare, however, and several authors of his time.

Words her worth had prov'd with deeds,
Had more ground been allow'd the race, and coted far his steeds.

Chapman, Ilad.

We coted them [the players] on the way, and hither are they coming.

Shakspeare, Ham.

Mary, we presently coted and outstript them.

Return from Parnassus, 1600.

TO COTE.* See TO QUOTE, which formerly was written cote.

COTE'MPORARY.* adj. [con and tempus, Latin. Bentley has remarked that cotemporary is a downright barbarism. "For the Latins never use co for con.

except before a vowel, as, coequal, coeternal; but, before a consonant, they either retain the n, as contemporary, constitution, or melt it into another letter, as, collection, comprehension: so that the word contemporary is a word, of his [Boyle's] own coposition, for which the learned world will cogratulate him!" Diss. on Phalaris, Pref. — It will not be easy to confute the reasoning of this remark, by which the just rule of formation to our compound words of this class is given; though many indeed affectedly write cogenial, copartment, and the like, as well as cotemporary. Sprat might have been added by Dr. Johnson to Locke in aid of cotemporary; and in modern times, both the Warton's have adopted this spelling. Yet Locke, and Cowley, and Dryden, and Addison, are Johnson's examples for contemporary; and Chillingworth and Steele will be found on the same side.] Living at the same time; coetaneous; contemporary.

What would not, to a rational man, cotemporary with the first voucher, have appeared probable, is now used as certain, because several have since, from him, said it one after another.

Locke.

COTEMPORARY.* n. s. One who lives at the same time.

We now find so much artifice amongst those our cotemporaries, who only follow rule and untaught nature.

Sprat, Hist. R. S. p. 81.

COTERIE.* n. s. [Fr. those who compose the modern coteries, will be surprised at Cotgrave's rude description of it! "COTERIE, company, society, association of country people." It is indeed a term adopted from the French trading partnerships or associations, where each contributed his quota of stock, and received in return the quota of profit. It has of late years been considered as meaning a select party, or club; and sometimes of ladies only.] A friendly or fashionable association. Of no great date in our language. Sterne somewhere uses it.

COTILLON.* n. s. [Fr. cotillon, a petticoat.] A brisk lively dance; in which eight persons are usually employed.

Brawls were a sort of figure dance then in vogue, and probably deemed as elegant as our modern cotillons.

Gray, Long Story, Note, ver. 11.

I could as easily reconcile it to my ideas of propriety, to see a chief justice, or an archbishop, display their activity in a cotillon, as to have seen Mr. Shenstone footing it in a country dance.

Graves, Recollect. of Shenstone, p. 45.

COTLAND. n. s. [cot and land.] Land appendant to a cottage.

COTQUEAN. n. s. [probably from coquin, French.] A man who busies himself with women's affairs.

Look to the bak'd meats, good Angelica;

Spare not for cost. —

Go, go, you cotquean, go;

Get you to bed.

Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

A stateswoman is as ridiculous a creature as a cotquean: each of the sexes should keep within its bounds.

Addison.

You have given us a lively picture of husbands hen-pecked; but you have never touched upon one of the quite different character, and who goes by the name of cotquean.

Addison.

COTSWOLD.* n. s. [Sax. cote, a cottage, and pold, a place without wood.] Sheepcotes, in an open country; whence the large tract of downs called Cotswold hills in Gloucestershire.

COTTAGE. n. s. [from cot.] A hut; a mean habitation; a cot; a little house.

The sea-coast shall be dwellings and cottages for shepherds, and folds for flocks.

Zeph. ii. 6.

They were right glad to take some corner of a poor cottage, and there to serve God upon their knees.

Hooker.

The self-same sun that shines upon his court, Hides not his visage from our cottage, but Looks on both alike.

Shakespeare, W. Tale.

Let the women of noble birth and great fortunes nurse their children, look to the affairs of the house, visit poor cottages, and relieve their necessities.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

It is difficult for a peasant, bred up in the obscurities of a cottage, to fancy in his mind the splendours of a court.

South.

Beneath our humble cottage let us haste,

And here, unenvied, rural dainties taste.

Pope, Odysseus.

COTTAGED.* adj. [from cottage.] Having cottages.

Ev'n humble Harting's cottag'd vale

Shall learn the sad repeated tale,

And bid her shepherds weep.

Collins, Ode v.

COTTAGELY.* adj. [from cottage.] Rustick; suitable to a cottage.

They envy others whatever they enjoy of estates, houses, or ornaments of life, beyond their tenuity or cottagely obscurity.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands, p. 172.

COTTAGER. n. s. [from cottage.]

1. One who lives in a hut or cottage.

Let us from our farms,

Call forth our cottagers to arms.

Swift.

The most ignorant Irish cottager will not sell his cow for a groat.

Swift, Add. to Parliament.

2. A cottager, in law, is one that lives on the common, without paying rent, and without any land of his own.

The husbandmen and plowmen be but as their work-folks and labourers, or else mere cottagers, which are but housed beggars.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

The yeomanry, or middle people, of a condition between gentlemen and cottagers.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

COTTIER.* n. s. This is our modern term for the next word, of which Dr. Johnson has noticed merely the existence; but cottier can boast good authority, and cotter indeed is an old Scottish word.

COTTIER.† n. s. [old Fr. cottier, Kelham and Cotgrave; "like enough," says Cotgrave, "the original of our cottager."] One who inhabits a cot.

Himself goes patch'd, like some bare cottyer.

Bp. Hall, Satires, iv. 2.

Cottiers; rustick, clownish.

Warburton.

COTTON. n. s. [named, according to Skinner, from the down that adheres to the mala cotonea, or quince, called by the Italians cotogni; whence cot-tone, Ital. cotton, French.]

1. The down of the cotton-tree.

The pin ought to be as thick as a rowling pin, and covered with cotton, that its hardness may not be offensive.

Wiseman.

2. Cloth made of cotton.

COTTON. n. s. A plant.

The species are, 1. Shrubby cotton. 2. The most excellent American cotton, with a greenish seed. 3. Annual shrubby cotton of the island of Providence. 4. The tree cotton. 5. Tree cotton with a yellow flower. The first sort is cultivated plentifully in Candia, Lemnos, Cyprus, Malta, Sicily, and at Naples; as also between Jerusalem and Damascus, from whence the cotton is brought annually into these northern parts of Europe. The cotton is the wool which incloses or wraps up the seeds, and is contained in a kind of brown husk or seed-vessel growing upon this shrub. It is from this sort that the vast quantities of cotton are taken, which furnish our parts of the world. The second and third sorts are annual: these are cultivated in the West Indies in great plenty. But the fourth and fifth sorts grow in Egypt; these abide many years, and often arrive to be trees of great magnitude. Miller.

To COTTON. v. n.

1. To rise with a nap.

2. To cement; to unite with: a cant word.

A quarrel will end in one of you being turned off, in which case it will not be easy to cotton with another. Swift.

COTTONOUS, or COTTONY.  adj.* [Fr. cottonneux.]

• Full of cotton; soft as cotton; overgrown with a white, soft, or cottonlike down. Cotgrave.

There is a salix near Dorking in Surrey, in which the julus bears a thick cottonous substance. Evelyn, i. 19. § 8.

Oaks bear also a knur full of a cottony matter, of which they anciently made wick for their lamps and candles. Ib. i. 3. § 17.

COTYLA, or COTYLE.  n. s.* [Fr. cotyle; Gr. κοτύλη, a cavity.]

1. The deep cavity of a bone, which receives the end of another in articulation.

2. A liquid measure in use among the ancients. [Lat. cotula, Fr. cotyle.]

To COUCH. v. n. [coucher, French.]

1. To lie down on a place of repose.

If I court more women, you'll couch with more men.

Shakespeare.

Doth not the gentleman

Deserve as full, as fortunate a bed,

As ever Beatrice shall couch upon?

Shakespeare.

When love's fair goddess

2. To lie down on the knees, as a beast to rest.

Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs,
Fierce tygers couch'd around, and lol'd their sawning tongues.

Dryden, Virg.

These, when death

Comes like a rushing lion, couch like spaniels,

With lolling tongues, and tremble at the paw.

Dryden.

3. To lie down in secret, or in ambush.

We'll couch i' the castle-ditch, till we see the light of our fauries.

Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

The earl of Angus couch'd in a furrow, and was passed over for dead, until a horse was brought for his escape.

Hayward.

4. To lie in a bed, or stratum.

Blessed of the Lord be his land for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath.

Deut. xxxiii. 13.

5. To stoop; or bend down; to lower, in fear, in pain, in respect.

Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two burdens.

Gen. xlix. 14.

To COUCH. v. a.

1. To repose; to lay on a place of repose.

Where unbruised youth, with unstuff'd brain,

Doth couch his limbs, there golden sleep doth reign.

Shakespeare.

2. To lay down any thing in a bed, or stratum.

If the weather be warm, we immediately couch malt about a foot thick; but if a hotter season require it, we spread it on the floor much thinner.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

The sea and the land make one globe; and the waters couch themselves, as close as may be, to the centre of this globe, in a spherical convexity.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

3. To bed; to hide in another body.

It is at this day in use at Gaza, to couch potsherds, or vessels of earth, in their walls; to gather the wind from the top, and to pass it down in spouts into rooms.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

4. To involve; to include; to comprise.

But who will call those noble who deface,

By meaner acts, the glories of their race;

Whose only title to their fathers' fame,

Is couch'd in the dead letters of their name?

Dryden, Juu.

That great argument for a future state, which St. Paul hath couch'd in the words I have read to you.

Atterbury, Sermon.

5. To include secretly; to hide: with under.

The foundation of all parables, is some analogy or similitude between the topical or allusive part of the parable and the thing couch'd under it, and intended by it. South.

There is all this, and more, that lies naturally couch'd under this allegory. L'Estrange.

The true notion of the institution being lost, the tradition of the deluge, which was couch'd under it, was thereupon at length suspended and lost. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

6. To lay close to another.

And over all, with brazen scales was arm'd,

Like plated coat of steel, so couch'd near,

That nought might pierce.

Spenser, H. Q.

7. To fix the spear in the rest; in the posture of attack.

The knight 'gan fairly couch his steady spear,

And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might.

Before each van

Prick forth the airy knights, and couch their spears,

'Till thickest legions close.

Milton, P. L.

The former wgv'd in air

His flaming sword, Æneas couch'd his spear. Dryden, Æn.

8. To depress the condensed crystalline humour or film that overspreads the pupil of the eye. This is improperly called couching the eye, for couching the cataract: with equal impropriety they sometimes speak of couching the patient.

Some artist, whose nice hand

Couches the cataracts, and clears his sight,

And all at once a flood of glorious light

Comes rushing on his eyes.

Deavis.

Whether the cataract be wasted by being separated from its vessels, I have never known positively, by dissecting one that had been couch'd.

Sharp.

COUCH. † n. s. [Fr. couche.]

1. A seat of repose, on which it is common to lie down dressed.

So Satan fell; and straight a fiery globe

Of angels on full sail of wing flew nigh,

Who on their plumed vans receiv'd him soft,

From his uneasy station; and upbore

As on a floating couch through the blithe air.

Milton, P. R.

To loll on couches, rich with citron studs,

And lay their guilty limbs in Tyrian beds.

O, ye immortal pow'rs that guard the just,

Watch round his couch, and soften his repose.

Addison, Cato.

2. A bed; a place of repose.

The beasts that ronue astrayc, seeketh their accustomed couches.

Bale, Pref. to Ieland's Journey, D. 2.

Let not the royal bed of Denmark be

A couch for luxury and damned incest.

Dirge was the tossing! deep the groans! despair

Tended the sick, busiest from couch to couch.

This gentle knight, inspir'd by jolly May,

Forsook his easy couch at early day.

Dryden, Fab.

3. A layer, or stratum.

This heap is called by malsters a couch, or bed of raw malt.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

COUCHANT. adj. [couchant, Fr.] Lying down; squatting.

If a lion were the coat of Judah, yet were it not probably a lion rampant, but rather couchant or dormant.

Brown.

As a tiger, who by chance hath spy'd,

In some purlieu, two gentle fawns at play,

Strait couches close; then rising, changes oft

His couchant watch.

Milton, P. L.

COUCHEE. † n. s. [French.] Bedtime; the time of visiting late at night.

None of her sylvan subjects made their court;

Levees and couches pass'd without resort.

Dryden.

Two days afterwards I was at the king's couchee, and wondered to see him quite cheerful, amidst such an intricacy of trouble.

Hervey's Memoirs, p. 95.

I was at the king's couchee, as I was three times in one week.

Ibid. p. 121.

COUCHER. † n. s. [from couch.]

1. He that couches or depresses cataracts.
 2. A bedfellow. [coucheur, Fr.] Cotgrave.
 COUCHIER.* n. s. [Fr. cacheur, the same as chartulaire. Cotgrave; from cache, to keep secret.] A register-book in monasteries.

The churchwardens of every parish shall deliver unto our visitours the inventories of vestments, copes, and other ornaments, plate, books, and specially of grayles, couchers, legends, &c. Q. Eliz. Injunctions, &c. 1559.

COUCHFELLOW.* n. s. [couch and fellow.] Bedfellow; companion.

I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, and your couchfellow, Nim; or else you had looked through the grate like a gemmy of baboons. Shakespeare.

COUCHGRASS. n. s. A weed.

The couchgrass, for the first year, insensibly robs most plants in sandy grounds apt to graze. Mortimer, Husbandry.

COUCHING.* n. s. [from to couch.] The act of bending or bowing. See TO COUCH.

These couchings, and these lowly courtesies, Might fire the blood of ordinary men. Shakespeare, Jul. Cesar.

COUD.* Often used by our old authors for COULD.

COVE.†. n. s.

1. A small creek or bay. [Icel. and Goth. kof, a cavern; Lat. covum.]

2. A shelter; a cover. [Arab. couffe.]

TO COVE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To arch over; to cover over.

The mosques and other buildings of the Arabians are rounded into domes and coved roofs.

Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, I. 44.

CO'VENABLE.* adj. [old Fr. covenable, proper.] Fit; suitable.

When a covenable day was fallen, Eroude in his birthe day made a soper to the princes, &c. Wicliffe, St. Mark, vi.

The covenable joyning of every of the sayd partes one with another, as they come together in sentences.

Palsgrave, Fr. Gr. 1521, B. iii. Intr.

CO'VENABLY.* adv. [from covenable.] Fitly; properly.

He shall here hym, toward owre lord the kyng and his people, in the same office wele and covenably.

Indenture of 1469, Archæol. xv. 177.

COVENANT.†. n. s. [old Fr. covenans, covenant, covenance; used for conventions, according to Lacombe, in the 10th century. Lat. conventum.]

1. A contract; a stipulation.

He makes a covenant never to destroy The earth again by flood; nor let the sea Surpass his bounds.

Milton, P. L.

The English make the ocean their abode,

Whose ready sails with ev'ry wind can fly,

And make a covenant with th' unconstant sky. Waller.

Some men live as if they had made a covenant with hell: let divines, fathers, friends say what they will, they stop their ears against them. L'Estrange.

2. An agreement on certain terms; a compact.

A covenant is a mutual compact, as we now consider it, betwixt God and man; consisting of mercies, on God's part, made over to man, and of conditions on man's part, required by God. Hammond, Pract. Cat.

3. A writing containing the terms of agreement.

I shall but lend my diamond till your return; let there be covenants drawn between us. Shakespeare, Cymb.

TO CO'VENANT. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To bargain; to stipulate.

His lord used commonly so to covenant with him, which if at any time the tenant disliked, he might freely depart at his pleasure. Spenser on Ireland.

By words men come to know one another's minds; by these they covenant and confederate. South.

Jupiter covenanted with him, that it should be hot or cold, wet or dry, calm or windy, as the tenant should direct. L'Estrange.

2. To agree with another on certain terms: with for before either the price or the thing purchased. They covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. St. Matt. xxvi. 15.

Pointing to a heap of sand,
For ev'ry grain to live a year demand;

But, ah! unmindful of th' effect of time,

Forgot to covenant for youth and prime. Garth's Ovid.

TO CO'VENANT.* v. a. To contract; to stipulate.

According to the word that I covenanted with you. Haggai, ii. 5.

It had been covenanted between him and the king of England, that neither of them should treat of peace or truce with the French king. Hayward on Edw. VI.

COVENANTE.* n. s. [from covenant.] A party to a covenant; a stipulator; a bargainer.

Both of them were respective rites of their admission into the several covenants, and the covenantees became thereby entitled to the respective privileges. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CO'VENANTER.†. n. s. [from covenant.] One who takes a covenant. A word introduced in the civil wars, Dr. Johnson says; which may be doubted. Dr. Johnson introduces the word only from the Oxford Reasons against the Covenant; but it had been used by Sir H. Wotton; and by another author, whom I cite, the word is employed without any reference to the cant expression in the civil wars.

I am sorry to hear of new oaths in Scotland between the covenanters, who they say will have none but Jesus Christ to reign over them. Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

They cut the calf in twaine; the manner of making covenants; whence the Hebrew phrase is to cut a covenant, that is, from the rite of cutting a beast in twaine, sometime for sacrifice, sometime for feasting; and the covenanters passing through between the parts of it, implying it seems, and that by way of execration, themselves to be alike cut in sunder in case of violating the conditions of the covenant.

Bp. Richardson on the O. Test. (1655) p. 424.

The covenanters shall have no more assurance of mutual assistance each from other, after the taking of the covenant, than they had before. Oxford Reasons against the Covenant.

CO'VENOUS. adj. [from covin.] Fraudulent; collusive; trickish.

I wish some means devised for the restraint of these inordinate and covenous leases of lands, holden in chief, for hundreds or thousands of years. Bacon, Off. of Alienation.

CO'VENT.* n. s. [old Fr. covent, for convent. Roquefort. Our old lexicography gives covent; and the word is usual in good writers. Covent-Garden is supposed to mean a garden that belonged to a convent; and thence its present name.] A convent, or monastery.

Their monasteries, covents, hospitals, &c.

Bale on the Revel. (1550) I. 8.

You will find a scar in his face, that was from a Roman assassinate, that would have killed him as he was turned to a wall near to his covent.

Sir H. Wotton, Lett. to the Regius Professor.

Abbess of that covent.

Bp. Hall, Works, iii. 993.

Putting the covent-seal to any deed. Burnet, Hist. Ref. 1. 3.

TO COVER. v. a. [couvrir, French.]

1. To overspread any thing with something else.

The pastures are cloathed with flocks, the valleys also are covered over with corn. Ps. lxxv. 13.

Sea cover'd sea,

Sea without shore.

Milton, P. L.

The flaming mount appear'd

In Dothan cover'd with a camp of fire.

Milton, P. L.

Go to thy fellows, bid them cover the table, seize in the meat, and we will come in to dinner.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

2. To conceal under something laid over.

Nor he their outward, only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness
Arrayed, cover'd from his father's sight.

Milton, P. L.

Cover me ye pines,

Ye cedars with innumerable boughs

Hide me, that I may never see them more.

Milton, P. L.

In life's cool vale let my low scene be laid,

Cover me, gods, with Tempe's thickest shade.

Cowley.

Or lead me to some solitary place,

And cover my retreat from human race.

Dryden, Virg.

3. To hide by superficial appearances.

4. To overwhelm; to bury.

Railery and wit serve only to cover nonsense with shame, when reason has first proved it to be mere nonsense.

Watts.

5. To conceal from notice or punishment.

Charity shall cover the multitude of sins.

1 Pet. iv. 8.

Thou may'st repent,

And one bad act with many deeds well done

May'st cover.

Milton, P. L.

6. To shelter; to protect.

His calm and blameless life

Does with substantial blessedness abound,

And the soft wings of peace cover him round.

Cowley.

7. To incubate; to brood on.

Natural historians observe, that only the male birds have voices; that their songs begin a little before breeding-time, and end a little after; that whilst the hen is covering her eggs, the male generally takes his stand upon a neighbouring bough within her hearing, and by that means amuses and diverts her with his songs during the whole time of her sitting.

Addison, Spect.

8. To copulate with a female.

9. To wear the hat, or garment of the head, as a mark of superiority, or independence.

That king had conferred the honour of grandee upon him, which was of no other advantage or signification to him, than to be covered in the presence of that king.

Dryden.

CO'VER.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Any thing that is laid over another.

The secundine is but a general cover, not shaped according to the parts, the skin is shaped according to the parts.

The fountains could be strengthened no other way than by making a strong cover or arch over them.

Burnet, Theory.

Orestes' bulky rage,

Unsatisfy'd with margins closely writ,

Foams o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.

Dryden, Juv.

With your hand, or any other cover, you stop the vessel, so as wholly to exclude the air.

Ray on the Creation.

2. A concealment; a screen; a veil; a superficial appearance, under which something is hidden.

The truth and reason of things may be artificially and effectually insinuated, under the cover either of a real fact, or of a supposed one.

1st Estrange.

As the spleen has great inconveniences, so the pretence of it is a handsome cover for imperfections.

Collier on the Spleen.

3. Shelter; defence from weather.

In the mean time, by being compelled to lodge in the field, which grew now to be very cold, whilst his army was under cover, they might be forced to retire.

Clarendon.

4. [In hunting.] Shelter; retreat, where the fox or hare is supposed to be.

CO'VERCLE.† n. s. [Fr. couvercle.] A lid or cover.

Cotgrave.

Except we take the onycha of that perfume for the covercle of a shell-fish, called unguis odoratus.

Sir T. Brown, Miscell. Tracts, p. 11.

CO'VERCHIEF.† n. s. [Fr. couvrechef, a kerchief. See KERCHIEF.] A covering for the head. Not now in use.

Her coverchiefs weren ful fine of ground,
That on the Sondag were upon her head.

Chaucer, C. T. Prolog.

CO'VERIE.† n. s. [from cover.] That which covers or protects.

They shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence [in the margin, covering, or coverer,] shall be prepared.

Nahum, ii. 5.

CO'VER-SHAME. n. s. [cover and shame.] Some appearance used to conceal infamy.

Does he put on holy garments for a cover-shame of lewdness?

Dryden, Span. Fryar.

CO'VER-SLUT.† n. s. [cover and slut.] An appearance to hide sluttishness.

Great Britain was not there. Almost in despair, I hope she will never, in any rags and cover-sluts of infamy, be seen at such an exhibition.

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

CO'VERING.† n. s. [from cover.] Dress; vesture; any thing spread over another.

The women took and spread a covering over the well's mouth.

2 Sam. xvii. 19.

Bring some covering for this naked soul,

Whom I'll intreat to lead me.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Through her flesh methinks is seen

The brightest soul that dwells within,

Our eyes the subtle covering pass,

And see the lily through its glass.

Cowley.

Then from the floor he rais'd a royal bed,

With coverings of Sidonian purple spread.

Dryden, Fab.

Sometimes Providence casts things so, that truth and interest lie the same way; and when it is wrapt up in this covering, men can be content to follow it.

South.

CO'VERIET.† n. s. [couvert, French. Perhaps our word should be correctly coverlit.] The outermost of the bedcloaths; that under which all the rest are concealed.

Lay her in lillies and in violets,

And silken curtains over her display,

And odour'd sheets, and arras coverlets.

Spenser, Epithal.

A flag of double use; for it serves as an umbrella abroad, and at home for a coverlet.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 314.

This done, the host produc'd the genial bed,

Which with no costly coverlet they spread.

Dryden, Fables.

I was for want of a house and bed, forced to lie on the ground, wrapt up in my coverlet.

Swift, Gull. Trav.

CO'VERT. n. s. [from cover; couvert, French.]

1. A shelter; a defence.

Let mine outcast dwell with thee, Moab; be thou a covert to them from the face of the spoiler.

Isaiah, xvi. 4.

There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the day time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and rain.

Isaiah, iv. 6.

They are by sudden alarm, or watch-word, to be called out to their military motions, under sky or covert, according to the season, as was the Roman wont.

Milton on Education.

It was the hour of night, when thus the Son

Commund'd in silent walk, then laid him down

Under the hospitable covert nigh

Of trees thick interwoven.

Milton, P. L.

Now have a care your carnations catch not too much wet, therefore retire them to covert.

Everlyn, Kalendar.

2. A thicket, or hiding place.

Tow'rd's him I made; but he was 'ware of me,

And stole into the covert of the wood.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Juliet.

I shall be your faithful guide,

Through this gloomy covert wile.

Milton, Comus.

Thence to the coverts, and the conscious groves,

The scenes of his past triumphs and his loves.

Denham.

Deep into some thick covert would I run,

Impenetrable to the stars or sun.

Dryden, State of Innocence.

The deer is lodg'd; I've track'd her to her covert;

Be sure ye mind the word; and when I give it,

Rush in at once, and seize upon your prey.

Addison, Cato.

CO'VERT. adj. [couvert, French.]

1. Sheltered; not open; not exposed.

C O V

You are, of either side the green, to plant a covert alley, upon carpenter's work, about twelve foot in height, by which you may go in shade into the garden. Bacon.

The fox is a beast also very prejudicial to the husbandman, especially in places that are near forest-woods and covert places. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Together let us beat this ample field, Try what the open, what the covert yield. Pope, Essays.

1. Secret; hidden; private; insidious.

And let us presently go sit in council, How covert matters may be best disclos'd, And open perils surest answered. Shakspeare, Jul. Cas.

By what best way, Whether of open war, or covert guile, We now debate. Milton, P. L.

CO'VERT. adj. [couvert, French.] The state of a woman sheltered by marriage under her husband; as covert baron, feme covert.

Instead of her being under covert baron, to be under covert feme myself; to have my body disabled, and my head fortified. Dryden, Span. Fryar.

CO'VERT-WAY. n. s. [from covert and way.]

It is, in fortification, a space of ground level with the field, on the edge of the ditch, three or four fathom broad, ranging quite round the half moons, or other works toward the country. One of the greatest difficulties in a siege is to make a lodgement on the covert-way, because usually the besieged pallisade it along the middle, and undermine it on all sides. It is sometimes called the corridor, and sometimes the counterscarp, because it is on the edge of the scarp. Harris.

CO'VERTLY. adv. [from covert.] Secretly; closely; in private, with privacy.

Yet still Aragnol (so his foe was hight) Lay lurking, covertly him to surprise. Spenser, Muirpotmos.
How can'st thou cross this marriage?
— Not honestly, my lord; but so covertly, that no dishonesty shall appear in me. Shakspeare, Much ado.

Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero; some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. Dryden.

CO'VERTNESS. n. s. [from covert.] Secrecy; privacy. Dict.

CO'VERTURE.† n. s. [old Fr. coverture, lieu secret. Roq.]

1. Shelter; defence; not exposure.

It may be it is rather the shade, or other coverture, that they take liking in, than the virtue of the herb. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
He saw their shame that sought Vain covertures. Milton, P. L.

The winds being so fierce, and so severe, as not to suffer any thing to thrive beyond the height of a shrub, in those islands, unless protected by walls, or other like coverture. Woodward.

2. [In law. "Coverture, old Fr. marriage subsistant. 960." Lacombe.] The estate and condition of a married woman, who, by the laws of our realm, is in potestate viri, and therefore disabled to contract with any, to the prejudice of herself or her husband, without his allowance or confirmation. Cowel.

The infancy of king Edward VI. and the coverture of queen Mary, did, in fact, disable them to accomplish the conquest of Ireland. Davies on Ireland.

To CO'VET. v. a. [convoiter, French.]

1. To desire inordinately; to desire beyond due bounds.

If it be a sin to covet honour, I am the most offending man alive. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

I am yet Unknown to woman, never was forsworn,

C O V

Scarcely have coveted what was mine own, At no time broke my faith. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

O father! can it be that souls sublime, Return to visit our terrestrial clime? And that the gen'rous mind, relens'd by death, Can covet lazy limbs and mortal breath? Dryden, Æn.

2. To desire earnestly.

All things coveting as much as may be to be like unto God in being ever; that which cannot hereunto attain personally, doth seek to continue itself another way, by offspring and propagation. Hooker.

But covet earnestly the best gifts. 1 Cor. xii. 31.

To CO'VET. v. n. To have a strong desire.

The love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith. 1 Tim. vi.

CO'VETABLE.† adj. [Fr. convoitable.] To be wished for; to be coveted. Sherwood.

CO'VETING.* n. s. [from covet.] Inordinate desire.

Be it lying, note it, The woman's; flattering, her's; deceiving, her's; Ambitions, covetings; change of prides, &c. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

CO'VETINGLY.* adv. [from coveting.] Eagerly. Most covetingly ready. B. Jonson, Cynthia Revels.

CO'VETISE.† n. s. [old Fr. covetise.] Avarice; covetousness of money. Not in use.

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffice, Whose greedy lust did lack in greatest store; Whose need had end, but no end covetise. Spenser, F. Q.

CO'VETOUS.† adj. [old Fr. coveteus, covitois; convoitos, convoiteux; from the Lat. convotare, Menage; from vovere votum, or concupire concupitum, Barbazan. V. Roquefort, Gloss.]

1. Inordinately desirous; cager.

2. Inordinately cager of money; avaricious.

An heart they have exercised with covetous practices. 2 Pct. ii. 14.
What he cannot help in his nature, you must not account a vice in him: you must in no ways say he is covetous. Shakspeare.

Let never so much probability hang on one side of a covetous man's reasoning, and money on the other, it is easy to foresee which will outweigh. Locke.

3. Desirous; cager: in a good sense.

Sheba was never More covetous of wisdom and fair virtue, Than this fair soul shall be. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

He that is envious or angry at a virtue that is not his own, at the perfection or excellency of his neighbour, is not covetous of the virtue, but of its reward and reputation, and then his intentions are polluted. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

CO'VETOUSLY.† adv. [from covetous.] Avariciously; eagerly.

If he care not for't, he will supply us easily; if he covetously reserve it, how shall's get it? Shakspeare.

Yet since the greater doth embrace the less, We covetously obey. B. Jonson, Sejanus.

CO'VETOUSNESS. n. s. [from covetous.]

1. Avarice; inordinate desire of money; eagerness of gain.

He that takes pains to serve the ends of covetousness, or ministers to another's lust, or keeps a shop of impurities or intemperance, is idle in the worst sense. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

Covetousness debaseth a man's spirit, and sinks it into the earth. Tillotson.

2. Eagerness; desire: in a neutral sense.

When workmen strive to do better than well, They do confound their skill in covetousness. Shakspeare, K. John.

CO'VEY.† n. s. [couvée, French; from the Lat. cubo.]

1. A hatch; an old bird with her young ones.
2. A number of birds together.

A flight of wrens and coveys of partridges went to a farmer, and begged a sup of him to quench their thirst. I. Strange.
A covey of partridges springing in our front, put our infantry in disorder. Addison, Frecholder.

There would be no walking in a shady wood without springing a covey of toasts. Addison, Guardian.

COUGH.† n. s. [Goth. kuef, a catarrh; kof, suffocation; Su. quaf, shortness of breath; Dutch, kuch, a cough.] A convulsion of the lungs, vellicated by some sharp serosity. It is pronounced coff.

In consumptions of the lungs, when nature cannot expel the cough, men fall into fluxes of the belly, and then they die. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

For his dear sake long restless nights you bore,
While rattling coughs his heaving vessels tore. Smith.

To COUGH.† v. n. [Su. quafsa; Dutch, kuchgen.] To have the lungs convulsed; to make a noise in endeavouring to evacuate the peccant matter from the lungs.

Thou didst drink
The stale of horses, and the gilded puddle
Which beasts would cough at. Shakspeare, Auth. and Cleop.
Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

The first problem enquireth why a man doth cough, but not an ox or cow; whereas the contrary is often observed. Brown.
If any humour be discharged upon the lungs, they have a faculty of casting it up by coughing. Ray on the Creation.

I cough like Horace, and though lean, am short. Pope's Ep.

To COUGH. v. a. To eject by a cough; to expectorate.

If the matter be to be discharged by expectoration, it must first pass into the substance of the lungs, then into the aspera arteria, or weasand, and from thence be coughed up, and spit out by the mouth. Wiseman's Surgery.

CO'UGHER. n. s. [from cough.] One that coughs. Dict.

CO'UHAGE.* n. s. A kind of kidney-beans imported from the East Indies, called stinking-beans. The down growing on the outside of the pod is so pointed, as like a nettle to sting the flesh. The word has been corrupted into cow-itch; has been so given by Mason in his Supplement to Johnson's Dictionary, and illustrated by a mistake of Congreve: "As if he had sat upon cow-itch."

CO'VIN.† } n. s. [Skinner writes it coven, from the CO'VINE. } Lat. conventum. So Bacon, convensus.
Thus the Welsh coven, a covenant. But covin is the old English word, and is so written by Chaucer; from the old Fr. corin, "convention secret, 906." Lacombe.] A deceitful agreement between two or more, to the hurt of another.

One covyn followeth another, and deceit is met with the lyke. Knight, Trial of Truth, (1580,) fol. 32. b.

The lawes overlashed by covine and craft,
And we that did governe did winke at this geare:
The worsen thereby our faithfull friends were. Mir. for Mag. p. 84.

CO'VING. n. s. [from cove.] A term in building, used of houses that project over the ground-plot and the turned projecture arched with timber, lathed, and plaistered. Harris.

COULD. [the imperfect preterite of can. See CAN.] Was able to; had power to.

And if I have done well, and as is fitting the story, it is that which I desired; but if slenderly and meanly, it is that which I could attain unto. 2 Mac. xv. 38.

What if he did not all the ill he could?

Am I oblig'd by that to assist his rapines,
And to maintain his murders? Dryden, Span. Prior.

COULD.* pret. of can, to know. See To CAN. [Sax. cude.] Knew. More frequently written, by our old authors, could.

It seem'd that whilome he had beene
Some goodly person, and of gentle race,
That could his good to all. Spenser, F. Q. vi. v. 36.

Nor need he guide; the way right well he could,
Which leads to sandy plains of Gaza old. Fairfax, Tass. x. 4.

CO'ULTER.† n. s. [coulter; Fr. cultop, Sax. culler, Latin.] The sharp iron of the plow which cuts the earth, perpendicular to the share.

The Israelites went down to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his ax, and his mattock. 1 Sam. xiii. 20.

Literature is the grindstone to sharpen the coulters, to whet their natural faculties. Hammond on Fundamentals.

The plough for stiff clays is long and broad, and the coulter long, and very little bending, with a very large wing. Mortimer.

CO'UNCIL. n. s. [concilium, Latin.]

1. An assembly of persons met together in consultation.

The chief priests, and all the council, sought false witness. Mat. xxvi. 59.

The Stygian council thus dissolv'd; and forth
In order came the grand infernal peers. Milton, P. L.

In histories composed by politicians, they are for drawing up a perpetual scheme of causes and events, and preserving a constant correspondence between the camp and the council table. Addison, Spect.

2. Act of publick deliberation.

The scepter'd herald, call
To council in the city gates: anon
Grey-headed men and grave, with warriors mix'd, Assemble, and harangues are heard. Milton, P. L.

3. An assembly of divines to deliberate upon religion.

Some borrow all their religion from the fathers of the Christian church, or from their synods or councils. Watts.

4. Persons called together to be consulted on any occasion, or to give advice.

They being thus assembled, are more properly a council to the king, the great council of the kingdom, to advise his majesty in those things of weight and difficulty, which concern both the king and people, than a court. Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

5. The body of privy counsellors.

Without the knowledge
Either of king or council, you made bold
To carry into Flanders the great seal. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

CO'UNCIL-BOARD. n. s. [council and board.] Council-table; table where matters of state are deliberated.

He hath commanded,
To morrow morning to the council-board,
He be convened. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

When ship-money was transacted at the council-board, they looked upon it as a work of that power they were obliged to trust. Clarendon.

And Pallas, if she broke the laws,
Must yield her for the stronger cause:
A shame to one so much ador'd
For wisdom at Jove's council-board. Swift.

CO'UNCIL-TABLE.* n. s. The same as council-board.

Wherewith he went at Heaven's high council-table
To sit the midst of Trinit Unity. Milton, Ode Nativ. st. 2.

Whether you be at the top of fame, or entirely unknown to mankind; at the council-table, or at Dick's coffee-house.

Gray to West.

COUNDERSTA'NDING.* n. s. [from con and under-standing.] Mutual understanding.

An art is invented to speak with hands only, to carry the alphabet upon one's joints, and at his fingers' ends; which may be learned without any great difficulty by any mean capacity, and whereby one may discourse and deliver the conceptions of his mind, without ever wagging of his tongue, provided there be a reciprocal knowledge and co-understanding of the art 'twixt the parties.

Howell, Lett. ii. 71.

TO COUNTE.* v. a. [from con and unite.] To unite.

Ahad these three in one doth co-unite.

More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 39.

COUNTE.* adj. [from the verb.] United.

She [the soul] —

Should be more perfectly these co-unite

In this her high and holy union,

Than with the body. More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 17.

CO'UNSEL.† n. s. [conj., Sax. consilium, Latin.]

1. Advice; direction

There is as much difference between the counsel that a friend giveth, and that a man giveth himself, as there is between the counsel of a friend and of a flatterer.

Bacon, Ess. 28.

The best counsel he could give him was, to go to his parliament.

Clarendon, b. viii.

Bereave me not,

Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,

Thy counsel in this uttermost distress. Milton, P. L.

2. Consultation; interchange of opinions.

I hold as little counsel with weak fear

As you, or any Scot that lives. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

3. Deliberation; examination of consequences.

They all confess therefore, in the working of that first cause, that counsel is used, reason followed, and a way observed.

Hooker, i. 2.

4. Prudence; art; machination.

O how comely is the wisdom of old men, and understanding and counsel to men of honour.

Eccles. xxv. 5.

There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord.

Prov. xxi. 30.

5. Secrecy; the secrets intrusted in consulting.

The players cannot keep counsel; they'll tell all. Shakspeare.

6. Scheme; purpose; design. Not in use.

The counsel of the Lord standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.

Psaln xxxiii. 11.

O God from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed.

Common Prayer.

7. Those that plead a cause; the counsellors. This seems only an abbreviature usual in conversation.

Your hand, a covenant; we will have these things set down by lawful counsel.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

For the advocates and counsel that plead, patience and gravity of learning is an essential part of justice; and art over speaking judge is no well tuned cymbal.

Bacon, Ess. 57.

What says my counsel learned in the law.

Pope.

CO'UNSEL-KEEPER.* n. s. [counsel and keeper.] One who can keep a secret; a confidant.

His man; — his note-book, his counsel-keeper.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

CO'UNSEL-KEEPING.* adj. That which preserves secrecy.

Curtain'd with a counsel-keeping cave. Tit. Andronicus.

TO CO'UNSEL.† v. a. [old Fr. conseiller; Lat. consilior.]

1. To give advice or counsel to any person.

But say, Lucretia, now we are alone,

Would'st thou then counsel me to fall in love? Shakspeare.

Truth shall nurse her;

Holy and heav'nly thoughts still counsel her.

Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

There is danger of being unfaithfully counsel'd, and more for the good of them that counsel than for him that is counsel'd.

Bacon.

Ill fortune never crushed that man whom good fortune deceived not; I therefore have counselled my friends never to trust to her fairer side, though she seemed to make peace with them.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

He supports my poverty with his wealth, and I counsel and instruct him with my learning and experience.

Bp. Taylor.

2. To advise any thing.

The less had been our shame,

The less his counsel'd crime which brands the Grecian name.

Dryden, Fub.

CO'UNSELLABLE.† adj. [from counsel.]

1. Willing to receive and follow the advice or opinions of others.

Very few men of so great parts were more counsellable than he; so that he would seldom be in danger of great errors, if he would communicate his own thoughts to disquisition.

Clarendon.

2. Advisable.

He did not believe it counsellable.

Ld. Clarendon's Life, i. 178.

CO'UNSELLOR. n. s. [from counsel.] This should rather be written counseller.

1. One that gives advice.

His mother was his counsellor to do wickedly. 2 Chr. xxii. 3.

She would be a counsellor of good things, and a comfort in cares.

Wisd. viii. 9.

Death of thy soul! Those linen checks of thine

Are counsellors to fear.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

2. Confidant; bosom friend.

In such green palaces the first kings reign'd,

Slept in their shades, and angels entertain'd;

With such old counsellors they did advise,

And by frequenting sacred groves grew wise

Waller.

3. One whose province is to deliberate and advise upon publick affairs.

You are a counsellor,

And by that virtue no man dare accuse you.

Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Of counsellors there are two sorts: the first, consiliarii natæ, as I may term them; such are the prince of Wales, and others of the king's sons: but the ordinary sort of counsellors are such as the king, out of a due consideration of their worth and abilities, and, withal, of their fidelity to his person and to his crown, calleth to be of council with him, in his ordinary government.

Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

4. One that is consulted in a case of law; a lawyer.

A counsellor bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws, may honestly inform a just prince, how far his prerogative extends.

Dryden, Jur. Dcd.

CO'UNSELLORSHIP. n. s. [from counsellor.] The office or post of a privy counsellor.

Of the great offices and officers of the kingdom, the most part are such as cannot well be severed from the counsellorship.

Bacon, Adv. to Villiers.

TO COUNT.† v. a. [counter, old Fr. compter, mod. computare, Lat.]

1. To number; to tell.

Here through this grate I can count every one,

And view the Frenchmen.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

The vicious count their years; virtuous, their acts. Jonson.

For the preferments of the world, he that would reckon up all the accidents that they depend upon, may as well undertake to count the sands, or to sum up infinity.

South.

When men in sickness ling'ring lie,

They count the tedious hours by months and years. Dryden.

Argos now rejoice, for Thebes lies low;

Thy slaughter'd sons now smile, and think they won,

When they can count more Theban ghosts than theirs. Dryden.

2. To preserve a reckoning.

Some people in America counted their years by the coming of certain birds amongst them at their certain seasons, and leaving them at others.

Locke.

3. To reckon; to place to an account.

He believed in the Lord, and he counted it to him for righteousness.

Gen. xxv. 6.

Not barely the plowman's pains is to be counted into the bread we eat; the labour of those who broke the oxen, must all be charged on the account of labour. Locke.

4. To esteem; to account; to reckon; to consider as having a certain character, whether good or evil.

When once it comprehendeth any thing above this, as the differences of time, affirmations, negations, and contradictions in speech, we then count it to have some use of natural reason. Hooker.

Count not thine handmaid for a daughter of Belial.

1 Sam. i. 16.

Nor shall I count it heinous to enjoy
The publick marks of honour and reward
Confer'd upon me.

Milton, S. A.

You would not wish to count this man a foe!
In friend-ship, and in hatred, obstinate.

Philips's Briton.

5. To impute to; to charge to.

All th' impossibilities, which poets
Count to extravagance of loose description,
Shall sooner be. . . Rome, Amb. Step-mother.

To COUNT. v. n. To found an account or scheme:
with upon.

I think it a great error to count upon the genius of a nation as a standing argument in all ages. Swift.

COUNT. † n. s. [compte, French; computus, Latin.]

1. Number.

That we up to your palaces may mount,
Of blessed saints for to increase the count. Spenser, Epithal.

2. Reckoning; number summed.

Every man according to his eating, shall make your count for the lamb. Exod. xii. 4.

By my count,
I was your mother much upon these years. Shakspeare.
Since I saw you last,
There is a change upon you.

Well, I know not
What counts hard fortune casts upon my face. Shakspeare.

3. Estimation; account.

Some other, that in hard assaies
Were cowards knowne, and little count did hold,
Either through gifts, or guile, or such like waies,
Crept in by stouping low. Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 18.

4. In law, a charge in an indictment, or a declaration in pleading.

COUNT. † n. s. [comle, Fr. comes, Lat.] A title of foreign nobility; supposed equivalent to an earl.
Comes, the count of the Franks, is the earl of the shire. Blackstone.

CO'UNTABLE. adj. [from count.] That which may be numbered.

The evils which you desire to be recounted are very many,
and almost countable with those which were hidden in the basket of Pandora. Spenser on Ireland.

CO'UNTENANCE. n. s. [countenance, Fr.]

1. The form of the face; the system of the features.

2. Air; look.

A made countenance about her mouth between simpering and smiling, her head bowed, somewhat down, seemed to languish with over much idleness. Sidney.

Well, Suffolk, yet thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest.
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.
So spake our sire, and by his count'nance seem'd Entering on studious thoughts abstruse. Milton, P. L.

To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul sedate,
Thus Turpin. Dryden, Trn.

3. Calmness of look; composure of face.

She smil'd severe; nor with a troubled look,
Or trembling hand, the fun'ral present took;
Ev'n kept her count'nance, when the lid remov'd,
Disclos'd the heart unfortunately lov'd. Dryden, Fab.

The two great maxims of any great man at court are, always to keep his countenance, and never to keep his word. Swift.

4. Confidence of mien; aspect of assurance: it is commonly used in these phrases in countenance, and out of countenance.

The night beginning to persuade some retiring place, the gentlewoman, even out of countenance before she began her speech, invited me to lodge that night with her father. Sidney.

We will not make your countenance to fall by the answer ye shall receive. Bacon, New Atlantis.

Their best friends were out of countenance, because they found that the imputations, which their enemies had laid upon them, were well grounded. Clarendon.

Your examples will meet it at every turn, and put it out of countenance in every place; even in private corners it will soon lose confidence. Spaul's Segm.

If the outward profession of religion and virtue were once in practice and countenance at court, a good treatment of the clergy would be the necessary consequence. Swift.

If those preachers would look about, they would find one part of their congregation out of countenance, and the other asleep. Swift.

It is a kind of ill manners to offer objections to a fine woman, and a man would be out of countenance that should gain the superiority in such a contest; a coquette logician may be rallied, but not contradicted. Addison, Freeholder.

It puts the learned in countenance, and gives them a place among the fashionable part of mankind. Addison, Freeholder.

5. Kindness or ill-will, as it appears upon the face.

Yet the stout fairy, 'mongst the midstest crowd,
Thought all their glory vain in knightly view,
And that great princess too, exceeding proud,
That to strange knight no better countenance allow'd.

Spenser, F. Q.

6. Patronage; appearance of favour; appearance on any side; support.

The church of Christ, which held that profession which had not the publick allowance and countenance of authority, could not use the exercise of Christian religion but in private.

Hooker.

His majesty maintained an army here, to give strength and countenance to the civil magistrate. Davies on Ireland.

Now then, we'll use
His countenance for the battle, which being done,
Let her who would be rid of him, devise
His speedy taking off. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

This is the magistrate's peculiar province, to give countenance to piety and virtue, and to rebuke vice and profaneness.

Atterbury.

7. Superficial appearance; show; resemblance.

The election being done, he made countenance of great discontent thereat. Ancham, Schoolmaster.

Oh, you blessed ministers above!
Keep me in patience, and with ripen'd time
Unfold the evil, which is here wrapt up
In countenance. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

Bianca's love
Made me exchange my state with Tranio,
While he did bear my countenance in the town. Shakspeare.

To CO'UNTENANCE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To support; to patronise; to vindicate.

Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause. Exod. xxiii. 7.

This conceit, though countenanced by learned men, is not made out either by experience or reason. Brown.

This national fault of being so very talkative, looks natural and graceful in one that has grey hairs to countenance it.

Addison.

2. To make a shew of.

Each to these ladies love did countenance,
And to his mistress each himself strove to advance.

Spenser, F. Q.

3. To act suitably to any thing; to keep up any appearance.

Malcolm! Banquo!
As from your graves rise up, and walk like spirits,
To countenance this horror. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

4. To encourage; to appear in defence.

At the first descent on shore he was not immured with a wooden vessel, but he did countenance the landing in his long-boat.

COUNTENANCER. † n. s. [from countenance.] One that countenances or supports another.

Are you her Grace's countenancer, Lady?

Beaumont and Fl. Honest Man's Fortune.

*He is a great countenancer of learned men.

Brown, Travels, (1685,) p. 141.

COUNTER. † n. s. [from count.]

1. A false piece of money used as a means of reckoning.

Will you with counters sum
The vast proportion of his infinite?

Shakespeare, Tr. and Cressida.

Though these half-pence are to be received as money in the Exchequer, yet in trade they are no better than counters.

Saunders, Consideration Wood's Coin.

2. Money in contempt.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous,
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods! with all your thunder-bolts,
Dash him to pieces.

Shakespeare, Jul. Cæs.

3 The table on which goods are viewed and money told in a shop.

A fine gaudy mix, that robs our counters every night, and then goes out, and spends it upon our cuckold-makers.

Dryden.

In half-whipt muslin, needles useless lie;

And shuttle-cocks across the counter fly.

Gay's Trivia.

Sometimes you would see him behind his counter selling broad-cloth, sometimes measuring linen.

Arbutnot.

Whether thy counter shine with suns untold,
And thy wide-grasping hand grows black with gold.

Saunders.

4. A box for cash.

Colles.

5. A reckoner. [compteur, Fr.]

Sherwood.

6. Encounter; trial of skill.

And he, the man whom nature self had made
To mock herself, and truth to imitate,
With kindly counter under mimic shade.

Spenser, Tears of the Muses.

7. An auditor. Chaucer uses this word, in the Prol. to his Canterbury Tales, saying of the Franklin, "A sheriff had he been, and a countour." Urry's edition of Chaucer reads coroner; and Mr. Warton has both adopted and illustrated that obtruded word. Nor has the genuine word, counter, satisfied Mr. Tyrwhitt, who confesses he knows not what to make of it; while he introduces, from Robert of Gloucester, what seems to illustrate the true expression, which exists in our old lexicography; namely, as an auditor, in that of Huloet.

And Adam of Arderne was his chief countour.

Robert of Glouc.

8. COUNTER of a horse, is that part of a horse's forehead that lies between the shoulder and under the neck.

Farrier's Dict.

CO'UNTER. * n. s. A name of some prisons in London.

Thou might'st as well say, I love to walk by the Counter-gate; which is as hateful to me as the reek of a lime-kiln.

Shakespeare, Merry W. of Windsor.

CO'UNTER. adv. [contre, Fr. contra, Lat.]

1. Contrary to; in opposition to: it is commonly used with the verb run, perhaps by a metaphor from the old tournaments.

Shall we erect two wills in God's, and make the will of his purpose and intention run counter to the will of his approbation.

South.

The profit of the merchant, and the gain of the kingdom, are so far from being always parallel, that frequently they run counter one to the other.

Child on Trade.

He thinks it brave, at his first setting out, to signalize himself in running counter to all the rules of virtue.

Locke.

2. The wrong way; contrarily to the right course.

How cheerfully on the false trail they cry,

Oh, this is counter, you false Danish dogs

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

3. Contrary ways.

A man whom I cannot deny, may oblige me to use persuasions to another, which, at the same time I am speaking, I may wish may not prevail on him: in this case, it is plain, the will and the desire run counter.

Locke.

4. The face in opposition to the back. Not in use.

They hit one another with darts, as the other do with their hands, which they never throw counter, but at the back of the flyer.

Sandys, Journey.

5. This word is often found in composition, and may be placed before either nouns or verbs used in a sense of opposition.

That design was no sooner known, but others of an opposite party were appointed to set a counter-petition on foot.

Clarendon.

TO COUNTERACT. † v. a. [counter and act.]

Formerly written also contra-act.] To hinder any thing from its effect by contrary agency.

In this case we can find no principle within him strong enough to counteract that principle, and to relieve him.

South.

These have no antagonist grinders, nor contra-acting millstones.

South's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 83.

COUNTERACTION. * n. s. [from the verb.] Opposition.

The beauties of writing have been observed to be often such as cannot, in the present state of knowledge, be evinced by evidence or drawn out into demonstrations: they are therefore wholly subject to the imagination, and do not force their effects upon a mind preoccupied by unfavourable sentiments, nor overcome the counter-action of a false principle or of stubborn partiality.

Johnson, Rambler, No. 93.

COUNTERATTRACTION. * n. s. [from counter and attraction.] Opposite attraction.

Attractions of either kind are less perspicuous, and less perceptible, through a variety of counter-attraction: that diminish their effect.

Shenstone.

TO COUNTERBALANCE. v. a. [counter and balance.] To weigh against; to act against with an opposite weight.

There was so much air drawn out of the vessel, that the remaining air was not able to counterbalance the mercurial cylinder.

Boyle.

Few of Adam's children are not born with some bias, which it is the business of education either to take off, or counterbalance.

Locke.

COUNTERBALANCE. n. s. [from the verb.] Opposite weight; equivalent power.

But peaceful kings, o'er martial people set,
Each other's poise and counterbalance are.

Dryden, An. Mith.

Money is the counterbalance to all other things purchasable by it, and lying, as it were, in the opposite scale of commerce.

Locke.

COUNTERBOND. * n. s. [from counter and bond.] A counter-surety, or counter-bond, to a surety.

Sherwood.

TO COUNTERBUFF. v. a. [from counter and buff.]

To impell in a direction opposite to the former impulse; to strike back.

The giddy ship, betwixt the winds and tides,

Forc'd back and forwards, in a circle rides,

Stunn'd with the diff'rent blows; then shoots amain,

'Till counterbuff'd she stops, and sleeps again.

Dryden.

CO'UNTERBUFF. n. s. [counter and buff.] A blow in a contrary direction; a stroke that produces a recoil.

He at the second gave him such a counterbuff, that, because Phalantus was not to be driven from the saddle, the saddle with broken girths was driven from the horse. Sidney.

Go, captain Stub, lead on, and show.

What house you come of, by the blow.

You give sir Quaintin, and the cuff

You 'scape o' th' sandbags counterbuff. B. Jonson.

CO'UNTERCAST.* n. s. [from counter, a false piece of money; and cast, to devise.] A trick; delusive contrivance.

He can devise this counter-cast of slight,
To give faire colour to that ladies cause in sight.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 16.

CO'UNTERCASTER. n. s. [from counter, for a false piece of money, and caster.] A word of contempt for an arithmetician; a book-keeper; a caster of accounts; a reckoner.

I, of whom his eyes had seen the proof
At Rhodes, at Cyprus, must be beleed and calm'd
By debtor and creditor, this countercaster.

Shakspeare, Othello.

COUNTERCHANGE. v. n. s. [Fr. contrechange.] Exchange; reciprocation.

She, like harmless lightning, throws her eye

On him, her brothers, me, her master, hitting

Each object with a joy. The counterchange

I severally in all. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

To CO'UNTERCHANGE. v. a. [Fr. contrechanger.] To give and receive; to exchange.

Then shall aggrandiz'd love confess

That souls can mingle substances,

That hearts can easily counter-changed be.

J. Hall, Poems, (1646) p. 28.

COUNTERCHARM. v. n. s. [counter and charm.] That by which a charm is dissolved; that which has the power of destroying the effects of a charm.

Now what your sense of the other world would be if you had seen it, that will your belief of it be, when 'tis founded upon clear and satisfactory evidence; 'twill be an infallible counter-charm against the most bewitching temptations.

Scott, Christian Life, ii. v.

But should I tell him that it was poison, that was of this so rare a taste, colour, and smell, this would be a full allay to his desire, and a sufficient counter-charm to all its other alluring qualities,

South, Sermon, viii. 106.

Now touch'd by counter-charms they change again,
And stand majestic, and recall'd to men.

Pope, Odyssey.

To CO'UNTERCHARM. v. a. [from counter and charm.] To destroy the effect of an enchantment.

For what to us is balm, to them are wounds,
Whom grief strikes, fear distracts, and shame confounds,
To find at once the magic counter-charm'd,
Their arts discover'd, and their strength disarm'd.

Ld. Falkland, Verses pref. to Sandys's Job, 1648.

Nor can her beams a heat convey
That may my frozen bosom warm,
Unless her smiles have power, as they
That a cross charm can countercharm.

Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 28.

Seducing Hope, farewell.

No more deceive me!

I now can countercharm thy spell. Cotton's, Ode to Hope.

Like a spell it was to keep us invulnerable, and so countercharm all our crimes, that they should only be active to please, not hurt us. Decay of Piety.

To CO'UNTERCHECK. v. a. [counter and check.]

To oppose; to stop with sudden opposition.

Untill some other realme, that on the frontiers lies,
Be hazarded again by other enemies,
Doe then betwixt themselves to composition fall,
To countercheck that sword, else like to conquer all.

Drayton, Polyolb. S. 3.

Who shall countercheck

The wanton pride of greatness.

Habington's Castara, P. ii.

COUNTERCHECK. v. n. s. [from the verb.] Stop; rebuke.

If again I said his beard was not well cut, he would say I lye: this is called the countercheck quarrelsome. Shakspeare.

COUNTERDISTINCTION.* n. s. [from counter and distinctio.] Contradistinction, which see.

I call it moral, in counterdistinction to philosophical or physical. More, Conject. Cabb. p. 295.

To COUNTERDRAW. v. a. [from counter and draw.]

With painters, to copy a design or painting by means of a fine linen cloth, an oiled paper, or other transparent matter, whereon the strokes appearing through are traced with a pencil.

Chambers.

COUNTEREVIDENCE. n. s. [counter and evidence.] Testimony by which the position of some former witness is opposed.

Sense itself detects its more palpable deceits by a counter evidence, and the more ordinary impostures seldom outlive the first experiments. Glanville, Scepais.

We have little reason to question his testimony in this point, seeing it is backed by others of good credit, and all because there is no counterevidence, nor any witness that appears against it. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

COUNTERFAISANCE.* See COUNTERFESSANCE.

To COUNTERFEIT. v. a. [contrefaire, French.]

1. To copy with an intent to pass the copy for an original; to forge.

What art thou,

That counterfeits the person of a king? Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

It came into this priest's fancy to cause this lad to counterfeit and personate the second son of Edward IV. supposed to be murdered. Bacon, Hen. VII.

There have been some that could counterfeit the distance of voices, which is a secondary object of hearing, in such sort, as when they stand fast by you, you would think the speech came from afar off in a fearful manner. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Say, lovely dream, where could'st thou find

Shadows to counterfeit that face?

Waller.

It happens, that not one single line or thought is contained in this imposture, although it appears that they who counterfeited me had heard of the true one. Swift.

2. To imitate; to copy; to resemble.

And, oh, you mortal engines, whose rude throat

Th' immortal Jove's dread clamours counterfeit!

Farewell! Shakspeare, Othello.

O Eve! in evil hour thou did'st give ear

To that false worm, of whomsoever taught

To counterfeit man's voice.

Milton, P. L.

To counterfeit is to put on the likeness and appearance of some real excellency: Bristol stones would not pretend to be diamonds, if there never had been diamonds. Tillotson.

To CO'UNTERFEIT.* v. n. To feign.

How ill agree it with your gravity,

To counterfeit thus grossly with your slave.

Shakspeare, Cor. of Err.

CO'UNTERFEIT. adj. [from the verb.]

1. That which is made in imitation of another, with intent to pass for the original; forged; fictitious.

I learn

Now of my own experience, not by talk,

How counterfeit a coin they are, who friends

Bear in their superscription; in prosperous days

They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their head.

Milton, S. A.

General observations drawn from particulars, are the jewels of knowledge, comprehending great store in a little room; but they are therefore to be made with the greater care and caution, lest, if we take counterfeit for true, our shame be the greater, when our stock comes to a severe scrutiny. Locke.

2. Deceitful; hypocritical.

True friends appear less mov'd than counterfeit. Ros. common.

CO'UNTERFEIT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. One who personates another: an imposter.

Now when these counterfeits were thus uncased
Out of the foreside of their forgerie,
And in the sight of all men cleane disgraced,
All gan to jest and gibe full merrilie
At the remembrance of their knaverie.

Spenser, E. Q. v. iii. 39.

I am no counterfeit: to die is to be a counterfeit; for he is but the counterfeit of a man, who hath not the life of a man.

Shakspeare.

This priest, being utterly unacquainted with the true person, according to whose pattern he should shape his counterfeit, yet could think it possible for him to instruct his player, either in gesture or fashions, or in fit answers to question, to come near the resemblance.

Baron.

But trust me, child, I'm much inclin'd to fear
Some counterfeit in this your Jupiter.

Addisor, Ovid.

2. Something made in imitation of another, intended to pass for that which it resembles; a forgery.

My father was I know not where,
When I was stamp'd. 'Some coiner, with his tools,
Made me a counterfeit; yet my mother seem'd
The Dian of that time.

Shakspeare, Cymb.

There would be no counterfeits but for the sake of something real; though pretenders seem to be what they really are not, yet they pretend to be something that really is.

Tillotson.

3. Formerly, it had not the bad sense, which is given in the preceding definition; it meant merely a resemblance, a likeness, a picture, or, as we now say, a copy.

What find I here?

Fair Portia's counterfeit? What denig'd
Hath come so near creation? Move these eyes?

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

CO'UNTERFEITER.† n. s. [from counterfeit.]

Proceedings against Garnet, (1604,) C. c. c. 2. b.

COUNTERPRESSURE. n. s. [counter and pressure.] Opposite force; power acting in contrary directions.

Does it not all mechanick heads confound,

That troops of atoms from all parts around,

Of equal number, and of equal force,

Should to this single point direct their course;

That so the counterpressure ev'ry way,

Of equal vigour, might their motions stay,

And, by a steady poise, the whole in quiet lay? } Blackmore

COUNTERPROJECT. n. s. [counter and project.] Correspondent part of a scheme.

A clear reason why they never sent any forces to Spain, and why the obligation not to enter into a treaty of peace with France, until that entire monarchy was yielded as a preliminary, was struck out of the counterproject by the Dutch.

Swift

To COUNTERPROVE. v. a. [from counter and prove.]

To take off a design in black lead, or red chalk, by passing it through the rolling-press with another piece of paper, both being moistened with a sponge.

Chambers.

COUNTER-REVOLUTION.* n. s. [counter and revolution.] A revolution succeeding another; and opposite to it; as from monarchy to republicanism, and then from republicanism to monarchy.

To COUNTERROLL. v. a. [counter and roll.] This is now generally written as it is spoken, control.

To preserve the power of detecting frauds by another account.

COUNTERROLLMENT. n. s. [from counterroll.] A counter account; controlment.

This manner of exercising of this office, hath many testimonies, interchangeable warrants, and counterrollments, whereof each, running through the hands, and resting in the power of many several persons, is sufficient to argue and convince all manner of falsehood.

Bacon.

COUNTERSCARF.* n. s. See COUNTERSCARP.

COUNTERSCARP.† n. s. [from counter and scarp.]

Sometimes written, by our old authors, and in our old lexicography, counterscarf. That side of the ditch which is next the camp, or properly the talus that supports the earth of the covert-way; although by this term is often understood the whole covert-way, with its parapet and glacis; and so it is to be understood when it is said the enemy lodged themselves on the counterscarp.

Harris.

The city is compassed with a thick stone wall, flanker'd and moated about; having withal a counterscarp, and 300 pieces of brass cannon mounted upon the bulwarks.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 40.

A regular fortification with half moons and counterscarps.

M. of Worcester, Cent. of Invent. § 29.

Guarding approaches, marching up into counterscarps, ranging forces in battle.

Ep. Parker, Repr. of the Rehearsal Transp. p. 303.

COUNTERSCUFFLE.* n. s. [from counter and scuffle.]

Conflict; contest; mutual opposition.

Hewyt's Sermon. (1638,) p. 97.

To CO'UNTERSEAL.* v. a. [from counter and seal.]

To seal together with others.

You shall bear
A better witness back than words, which we,
On like condition, will have counters. al'd.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus.

To COUNTERSECURE.* v. a. [from counter and secure.]

To render more secure by corresponding means.

What have the regicides promised you in return, in case you should shew what they would call disposition to conciliation and equity, whilst you are giving that pledge from the throne, and engaging parliament to countersecure it?

Burke on a Regicide Peace.

CO'UNTERSENSE.* n. s. [from counter and sense.]

Opposite meaning.

There are some words now in French, which are turned to a countersense.

Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

To COUNTERSIGN.† v. a. [from counter and sign.]

To sign an order or patent of a superiour, in quality of secretary, to render it more authentick. Thus charters are signed by the King, and counter-signed by a secretary of state, or lord chancellor.

Chambers.

He had brought a letter to his lordship from the king, with one enclosed in it to the lords of the privy council, which he shewed me. I read it; it was counter-signed Melford.

Ld. Chandon's Diary, 1688-9.

CO'UNTERSIGN.* n. s. [from the verb.] A military expression, denoting the watch-word of the day.

CO'UNTERSIGNAL.* n. s. [from counter and signal.]

A corresponding signal; a naval term.

CO'UNTERSNAUL.* n. s. [from counter and snarl.]

Snarl in defence, or opposition.

As a cur that goes through a village, if he clap his tail between his legs and run away, every cur will insult over him; but if he bristle up himself, and stand to it, give but a countersnarl, there's not a dog dares meddle with him: much is in a man's courage and discreet carriage of himself.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 364.

COUNTERSTA'TUTE.* n. s. [from counter and statute.]

A contradictory ordinance.

His own antimony or counterstatute.

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

CO'UNTERSWAY.* n. s. [from counter and sway.]

Opposite influence, or direction.

By a countersway of restraint curbing their wild exorbitance almost in the other extreme; as when we bow things the contrary way, to make them come to their natural straightness.

Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

CO'UNTERSTROKE.* n. s. [from counter and stroke.]

A stroke returned.

He met him with a countersstroke so swift,
That quite snit off his arme as he it up did lift.

Spenser, F. Q. v. 7.

COUNTERSU'RETY.* n. s. [from counter and surety.]

A counter-bond to a surety.

Sherrwood.

CO'UNTERTALLY.* n. s. [from counter and tally.]

One of the two tallies, on which any thing is scored.

Chambers.

COUNTERTA'STE.* n. s. [from counter and taste.]

False taste.

There is a kind of countertaste founded on surprise and curiosity, which maintains a sort of rivalry with the true.

Shenstone.

COUNTERTE'NOR. n. s. [from counter and tenor.]

One of the mean or middle parts of musick; so called, as it were, opposite to the tenor.

Harris.

I am deaf: this deafness unqualifies me for all company, except a few friends with countertenor voices.

Swift.

CO'UNTERTIDE. n. s. [from counter and tide.]

Contrary tide; fluctuations of the water.

Such were our countertides at land, and so

Presaging of the fatal blow,
In your prodigious ebb and flow.

Dryden.

CO'UNTERMINE. n. s. [from counter and time, contresens, French.]

1. The defence or resistance of a horse, that intercepts his cadence, and the measure of his manage.

Farrier's Dict.

2. Defence; opposition.

Let cheerfulness on happy fortune wait,

And give not thus the countermine to fate.

Dryden, Aurengz.

CO'UNTERTURN. n. s. [from counter and turn.]

The catastrophe, called by the Romans status, the height and full growth of the play, we may call properly the counterturn, which destroys that expectation, embroils the action in new difficulties, and leaves you far distant from that hope in which it found you.

Dryden on Dramatick Poesy.

To CO'UNTERVAIL. v. a. [from contra and valeo, Lat.]

To be equivalent to; to have equal force or value; to act against with equal power.

In some men there may be found such qualities as are able to countervail those exceptions which might be taken against them, and such men's authority is not likely to be shaken off.

Hooker.

And therewithal he fiercely at him flew,

And with important outrage him assail'd;

Who, soon prepar'd to field, his sword forth drew,

And him with equal valour countervail'd.

Spenser, F. Q.

The outward strengths, which descend, must be of so much force as to countervail all that weight whereby the ascending side does exceed the other.

Wilkins's Dædalus.

We are to compute, that, upon balancing the account, the profit at last will hardly countervail the inconveniencies that go along with it.

L'Estrange.

CO'UNTERVAIL. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Equal weight; power or value sufficient to obviate any effect or objection.

2. That which has equal weight or value with something else.

Surely, the present pleasure of a sinful act is a poor countervail for the bitterness of the review, which begins when the action ends, and lasts for ever.

South, Sermon.

CO'UNTERVIEW. n. s. [from counter and view.]

1. Opposition; a posture in which two persons front each other.

Mean while, ere thou was sinn'd and judg'd on earth

Within the gates of hell sat sin and death,

In counterview.

Milton, P. L.

2. Contrast; a position in which two dissimilar things illustrate each other.

I have drawn some lines of Linger's character, on purpose to place it in counterview or contrast with that of the other company.

Swift.

To CO'UNTERVOTE.* v. a. [from counter and vote.]

To oppose; to outvote.

The law in our minds being countervoted by the law in our members.

Scott, Chr. Life, i. iii.

To CO'UNTERWEIGH.* v. n. [from counter and weigh.]

To weigh against.

If Wrights had ten fellowships of St. John's, it would not counterweigh with the loss of this occasion.

Archam, Letter to Raven.

To CO'UNTERWHEEL.* v. a. [from counter and wheel.]

To make to wheel, or move backwards and forwards, in opposition to other movements; a military phrase.

The Falcon charges at first view

With her brigade of talons, through

Whose shoots the wary Heron beat

With a well countervheel'd retreat.

Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 27.

CO'UNTERWIND.* n. s. [from counter and wind.]

Contrary wind. See COUNTER-TIDE.

Like as a ship, that through the ocean wyde
Directs her course unto one certayne coast,
Is met of many a counter-winde and tyde;

Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 1.

To Co'UNTERWORK. v. a. [counter and work.] To counteract; to hinder any effect by contrary operations.

Whilst some, covetous
Above the rest, seek to engross me whole,
And counter-work the one unto the other,
Content in gifts, as they would seem in love. B. Jonson, Fox.
Can men think that God ever designed prayer as an engine to counter-work or control nature, to reverse its laws, and alter the course of the universe? South, Sermon, vi. 393.

But heav'n's great view is one, and that the whole:
That counter-works each folly and caprice;
That disappoints th' effect of ev'ry vice. Pope.

Co'UNTISS. v. n. s. [comitissa, Lat. comitessa, French, comtesse, Sax.] The lady of an earl or count.

I take it, she that carries up the train,
Is that old noble lady, the dutchess of Norfolk.
—It is, and all the rest are countesses. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

It is the peculiar happiness of the countess of Abingdon to have been so truly loved by you, while she was living; and so gratefully honoured after she was dead. Dequien.

Co'UNTING-HOUSE. n. s. [count and house.] The room appropriated by traders to their books and accounts.

Men in trade seldom think of laying out money upon land, till their profit has brought them in more than their trade can well employ; and their idle bags, cumbering their counting- houses, put them upon emptying them. Locke.

Co'UNTLESS. adj. [from count.] Innumerable; without number; not to be reckoned.

Ay, tear for tear, and loving kiss for kiss,
Thy brother Marcys tenders on thy lips:
O, were the sum of these that I should pay
Countless and infinite, yet would I pay them. Shakespeare.
But oh, her mind, that oreus which includes
Legions of mischief, countless multitudes
Of former curses. Donne.

By one countless sum of woes oppress,
Hoary with cares, and ignorant of rest,
We find the vital springs relax'd and worn;
Thus, thro' the round of age, to childhood we return. Prior.
I see, I cry'd, his woes, a countless train;
I see his friends o'erwhelm'd beneath the main. Pope, Odyssey.

Co'UNTRIFIED.* adj. [from country. A word of recent formation in our language; and in no dictionary, I believe; but now common.] Rustick; rude.

Although Hertfordshire is situated in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, yet, great part of it being no general thoroughfare, nor much-frequented high-road, the inhabitants are likely to be as contrified as persons living at a greater distance from town. Grose's Local Proverbs.

COUNTRY. n. s. [contrée, Fr. contrata, low Latin; supposed to be contracted from contrerrata.]

1. A tract of land; a region, as distinguished from other regions.

They require to be examined concerning the descriptions of those countries of which they would be informed. Sprat.

2. The parts of a region distant from cities or courts;
rural parts.

Would I a house for happiness erect
Nature alone should be the architect;
She'd build it more convenient than great,
And doubtless in the country chuse her seat. Conley.
I see them hurry from country to town, and then from the town back again into the country. Spectator.

3. The place which any man inhabits, or in which he at present resides.

Send out more horses, skirre the country round,
Hang those that talk of fear. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

4. The place of one's birth; the native soil.
The king set on foot a reformation in the ornaments and advantages of our country. Sprat.

O, save my country, heav'n, shall be your last. Pope.

5. The inhabitants of any region.
All the country, in a general voice,
Cry'd hate upon him; all their prayers and love
Were set on Gloucester. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

C'OUNTRY. adj.

1. Rustick; rural; villatick.

Cannot a country wench know, that having received a shilling from one that owes her three, and a shilling also from another that owes her three, that the remaining debts in each of their hands are equal? Locke.

I never meant any other, than that Mr. Trot should confine himself to country dances. Spectator.

He comes no nearer to a positive, clear idea of a positive infinite, than the country fellow had of the water which was yet to pass the channel of the river where he stood. Locke.

Talk but with country people, or young people, and you shall find that the notions they apply this name to, are so odd that nobody can imagine they were taught by a rational man. Locke.

A country gentleman, learning Latin in the university, removes thence to his mansion-house. Locke.

The low mechanicks of a country town do somewhat outdo him. Locke.

Come, we'll e'en to our country seat repair,
The native home of innocence and love. North.

2. Of an interest opposite to that of courts; as, the country party.

3. Peculiar to a region or people.
She laughing the cruel tyrant to scorn, spake in her country
language. 2 Macb. vii. 27.

4. Rude; ignorant; untaught.
We make a country man dumb, whom we will not allow to speak but by the rules of grammar. Druidon, Dufresnoy.

COUNTRY-DANCE.* n. s. A well-known kind of dance; usually so written, and noticed by Dr.
Johnson under the adjective country. But some suppose country-dance to be a corruption of the French contre and danse, from the circumstance of the parties standing opposite to each other. Cot-grave takes no notice of such circumstance under danse; but, in the word CORDACE, he speaks of country-dance; which is in favour of the English origin and orthography. In the Shrewsbury Papers, “contrey dances” are part of an entertainment at Court, in 1602, vol. iii. p. 148.

Co'UNTRYMAN. n. s. [from country and man.]

1. One born in the same country, or tract of ground.
Locke.

See, who comes here?
My countryman; but yet I know him not. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

Homer, great bard, so fate ordain'd, arose;
And bold as were his countrymen in fight,
Snatch'd their fair actions from degrading prose,
And set their battles in eternal light. Prior.

The British soldiers act with greater vigour under the conduct of one whom they do not consider only as their leader, but as their countryman. Addison on the War.

2. A rustick; one that inhabits the rural parts.
All that have business to the court, and all countrymen coming up to the city, leave their wives in the country. Graunt.

3. A farmer; a husbandman.
A countryman took a boar in his corn. L'Estrange.
COUNTY. v. n. s. [counté, old Fr. comté, mod. com- mitatus, Latin.]

is a tub.] A vessel in which water, is carried on a pole between two.

COWL-STAFF. † n. s. [cowl and staff. More usually written cowl-staff. See COL-STAFF. Cotgrave calls it "a colestaff or stang," our old word for a long pole.] The staff on which a vessel is supported between two men.

Mounting him upon a cowl-staff,
Which (tossing him something high)

He apprehended to be Pegasus.

Suckling.

The way by a cowl-staff is safer: the staff must have a bunch in the middle, somewhat wedge-like, and covered with a soft bolster.

Wreman.

CO'WLED.* adj. [from cowl.] Wearing a cowl.

Here the cowl'd zealots with united cries

Urg'd the crusade.

Shenstone, Ruin'd Abbey.

CO'WLIKE.* adj. [from cow and like.] Resembling a cow.

With cowlike udders, and with oxlike eyes. Pope, Dunciad.

COW-ORKER.* n. s. [from cow and worker.] One engaged in the same work; fellow-labourer.

There is mention made by Munster of one Moses Gerundensis, whose opinion it was, that God Almighty spake these words, "Let us make man," to the Earth; as if God and the Earth, as co-workers, made man betwixt them; the Earth his body, and God his soul!

Gregory, Dict. of the Trin. p. 29.

In all acquired gifts, or habits, such as those of philosophy, oratory, or divinity, we are properly co-workers with God.

South, Sermon, iii. S. xi.

CO'WSLIP. n. s. [paralysis; euphrype, Sax. as some think, from their resemblance of scent to the breath of a cow; perhaps from growing much in pasture grounds, and often meeting the cow's lip.] Cowslip is also called pagil, grows wild in the meadows, and is a species of primrose.

Miller.

He might as well say, that a cowslip is as white as a lily.

Sulney.

Where the bee sucks, there suck I;

In a cowslip's bell I lie.

Shakespeare, Tempest.

Thy little sons

Permit to range the pastures: gladly they

Will mow the cowslip posies, faintly sweet.

Philips.

COWS-LUNGWORT. n. s. A species of Mullein.

CO'XCOMB. † n. s. [cock and comb, corrupted from cock's comb.]

1. The top of the head.

As the cockney did to the eels, when she put them, i' the pasty alive; she rapt them o' the coxcombs with a stick, and cried down, wantons, down.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

2. The comb resembling that of a cock, which licensed fools were formerly in their caps. "Natural idiots, and fools, have, and still do accustom themselves to wear in their cappes cockes feathers, or a hat with a neck and head of a cocke on the top, and a bell thereon."

Minshew.

There take my coxcomb: why this fellow has banished two of his daughters, and did the third a blessing against his will: if thou follow him, thou must needs wear my coxcomb.

Shakespeare.

3. A fop; a superficial pretender to knowledge or accomplishments. This meaning was adopted from the preceding signification.

I sent to her,

By this same coxcomb that we have i' th' wind,

Tokens and letters, which she did resend.

Shakespeare.

I scorn, quoth she, thou coxcomb silly,

Quarter or council from a foe.

Hudibras.

It is a vanity for every pretending coxcomb to make himself one of the party still with his betters.

I. E. Strange.

They overflowed with smart repartees, and were only distinguished from the intended wits by being called coxcombs, though they deserved not so scandalous a name.

Dryden.

Some are bewilder'd in the maze of schools;
And some made coxcombs, nature meant but fools.

Pope.

4. A kind of red flower.

CO'XCOMBLY.* adj. [from coxcomb.] Like a coxcomb; foolish; vain.

My look ~~terrify~~ them, you coxcombly ass, you!

Beaton, and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

She is a most engaging creature, if she were not so fond of that damn'd coxcombly lord of her's.

Congreve, Doubt Dealer.

CO'XCOMICAL. adj. [from coxcomb.] Foppish; conceited: a low word unworthy of use.

Because, as he was a very natural writer, and they were without prejudice, without prepossession, without affectation, and without the influence of coxcomical, sensless, cabals, they were at liberty to receive the impressions which things naturally made on their minds.

Dennis.

COY. † adj. [coy, old French, from coquus, Latin.]

1. Modest; decent.

Jason is as coy as is a maid;

He look'd piteously, but nought he said.

Chaucer.

2. Reserved; not accessible; not easily condescending to familiarity.

And vain delight she saw he light did pass,

A foe of folly and immodest toy;

Still solemn sad, or still disdainful coy.

Spenser.

Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse.

Milton, Lycidas.

Like Phœbus sing the no less amorous boy;

Like Daphne she, as lovely, and as coy.

Waller.

At this season, every smile of the sun, like the smile of a coy lady, is as dear as it is uncommon.

Pope.

The Nile's coy source.

Grainger.

To COY. v. n. [from the adjective.]

1. To behave with reserve; to reject familiarity.

What, coying it again!

No more; but make me happy to my gust,

That is, without your struggling.

Dryden, K. Arthur.

Retire! I beg you, leave me. —

— Thus to coy it!

With one who knows you too!

Rowe, Jane Shore.

2. To make difficulty; not to condescend willingly.

If he coy'd

To hear Cominius speak, I'll keep at home. Shakespeare, Coriol.

To COY. v. a. [for decay, Dr. Johnson says. The word bears that sense indeed; but may be from the old French verb coyer, "attacher, joindre ensemble," Lacombe. Dr. Johnson also, defining the present word, "to allure," says that it is not in use, and cites only the passage in Coriolanus. This is, however, a great mistake. It is one of our oldest verbs, and is abundantly employed, both figuratively and simply, with good effect, by some of our best writers. "To coyer, blandior," Prompt. Parv.] To allure; to flatter; to caress; to pat or stroke.

I'll mountebank their loves,

Coy their hearts from them, and come home below'd

Of all the trades in Rome.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

Come, sit thee down upon this flowery bed,

While I thy amiable cheeks do coy.

Shakespeare, Mids. N. Dr.

A fickle sex, and true in trust to no man;

A servant sex, soon proud if they be coy'd;

And to conclude, thy mistress is a woman.

Who shall march out before ye, coy'd and courted

By all the mistresses of war.

Bacon, and Fl. Bondura.

Pleasure is like a dog, which being coy'd, and stroked, follows us at the heel; but if rated and beaten off, is driven away from us with ease.

Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 23.

Now there are sprung up a wiser generation in this kind, who have the art to coy the fonder sort into their nets, who have now reduced gaming to a science.

Bp. Rainbow, Sermon, (1635.) p. 2.

CO'YISH.* adj. [from coy.] Not condescending to familiarity; modest; reserved.

He took her in his arms, as yet so coyish to be kist.

Warner, Albion's England, (1597.)

CO'YLY. † adv. [from coy.] With reserve; with disinclination to familiarity.

This said; his hand he coyly snatch away,
From forth Antinous' hand. Chapman, Odyssey.

Then doth she coyly turn her face aside,
That half her cheek is scarce sometimes descried.

Sir J. Davies, Orchestra, (1599.)

There is no need at all,
That the balsam-sweating bough
So coyly should let fall
His medicinal tears.

Crashaw's Poems, p. 3.

The modest maid
But coyly sips, and blushing drinks, abash'd,

Somerville's Rural Games, C. iii.

CO'YNESS. n. s. [from coy.] Reserve; unwillingness to become familiar.

When the sun bath warmed the earth and water, three or four male carps will follow a female: and she putting on a seeming coyness, they force her through weeds and flags.

Walton's Angler.

When the kind nymph would coyness feign,
And hides but to be found again.

Dryden.

COYSTREL. n. s. A species of degenerate hawk. See COISTREL.

One they might trust, their common wrongs to wreak:
The musquet and the coystrel were too weak,
Too fierce the falcon.

Dryden, Hind and Panther.

COZ. n. s. A cant or familiar word, contracted from cousin.

Be merry, coz; since sudden sorrow
Serves to say thus, some good thing comes to-morrow.

Shakespeare.

TO CO'ZEN. † v. a. [To coze is in the old Scotch dialect, as Junius observes, to chop or change; whence cozen, to cheat, because in such traffick there is commonly fraud.] So far Dr. Johnson. But see TO CHOUSE. † To cheat; to trick; to defraud.

Let the queen pay never so fully, let the master-master view them never so diligently, let the deputy or general look to them never so exactly, yet they can cozen them all.

Spenser.

Goring loved no man so well but that he would cozen him, and expose him to publick mirth for having been cozen'd.

Clarendon.

He that suffers a government to be abused by carelessness or neglect, does the same thing with him that maliciously and corruptly sets himself to cozen it.

I. Extrange.

You are not obliged to a literal belief of what the poet says; but you are pleased with the image, without being cozened by the fiction.

Dryden.

What if I please to lengthen out his date

A day, and take a pride to cozen fate.

Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Children may be cozened into a knowledge of the letters, and be taught to read, without perceiving it to be any thing but a sport.

Locke on Education.

CO'ZENAGE. n. s. [from cozen.] Fraud; deceit; artifice; fallacy; trick; cheat; the practice of cheating.

They say this town is full of cozenage,
As nimble jugglers that deceive the eye
Disguised cheaters.

Shakespeare.

Wisdom without honesty is meer craft and cozenage, and therefore the reputation of honesty must first be gotten, which cannot be but by living well: a good life is a main argument.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

There's no such thing as that we beauty call,

It is meer cozenage all;

For though some long ago

Lik'd certain colours mingl'd so and so,

That doth not tie me now from chusing new.

Suckling.

Imaginary appearances offer themselves to our impatient minds, which entertain these counterfeits without the least suspicion of their cozenage.

Glanville, Scerpsis.

Strange cozenage! none would live past years again,
Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain;

And from the drops of life, think to receive
What the first sprightly running could not give.

Dryden, Aurengzebe.

But all these are trifles, if we consider the fraud and cozenage of trading men and shopkeepers.

Swift.

CO'ZENER. † n. s. [from cozen.] A cheater; a defrauder.

Indeed, sir, there are cozeners abroad, and therefore it behoves men to be wary.

Shakespeare, Win. Tale.

Apt to all stratagems, thefts, treasons, &c. cozeners, shifters, outlaws.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.

Like to a jugler's trick of legerdemaine, in deluding his beholders, when he conveyeth a ring into another man's pocket, and then calleth the man cozenier when he hath done.

Bp. Moflon's Discharge, &c. p. 220.

COZIER.* See COSIER.

CRAB. n. s. [crabba, Sax. krabbe, Dutch.]

1. A crustaceous fish.

Those that cast their shell are, the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, the hodmandod or dodman, and the tortoise. The old shells are never found; so as it is like they scale off and crumble away by degrees.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The fox catches crab fish with his tail, which Olaus Magnus saith he himself was an eye-witness of.

Derham.

2. A wild apple; the tree that bears a wild apple.

Noble stock

Was graft with crab-tree slip, whose fruit thou art.

Fetch me a dozen crab-tree staves, and strong ones: these are but switches.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

When roasted crabs hiss in the bowl,

Then nightly sings the staring owl,

Shakespeare.

Tell why a graft, taking nourishment from a crab stock, shall have a fruit more noble than its nurse and parent.

Taylor.

3. A peevish morose person.

4. A wooden engine with three claws for launching of ships, or heaving them into the dock.

Philips.

5. The sign in the zodiac.

Then parts the Twins and Crab, the dog divides,

And Argo's keel, that broke the frothy tides.

Creech.

CRAB. † adj. It is used by way of contempt for any sour or degenerate fruit; as, a crab cherry, a crab plum.

That liberality hated to provide crab wine for his guests.

Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 2.

Better gleanings their worn soil can boast,

Than the crab vintage of the neighb'ring coast.

Dryden.

TO CRAB.* v. a. [from the noun.] To sour; to render peevish or morose.

'Tis easy to observe how age or sickness sours and crabs our nature.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 33.

CRABBED. adj. [from crab.]

1. Peevish; morose; cynical; sour.

A man of years, yet fresh, as mote appear,

Of swarth complexion, and of crabbed hue,

That him full of melancholy did shew.

Spenser, F. Q.

O, she is

Ten times more gentle, than her father's crabbed;

And he's compos'd of harshness.

Shakespeare, Tempest.

2. Harsh; unpleasing.

That was when

Three crabbed months had sour'd themselves to death,

Ere I could make thee open thy white hand,

And clepe thyself my love,

Shakespeare, Win. Tale.

How charming is divine philosophy!

Not harsh and crabbed, as dull fools suppose,

But musical as is Apollo's lute,

And a perpetual feast of nectar'd sweets,

Where no crude surfeit reigns.

Milton, Comus.

3. Difficult; perplexing.

Beside he was a shrewd philosopher,

And had read ev'ry text and gloss over;

Whate'er the crabbedst author hath,

He understood b' implicit faith.

Rudibrus.

Lucretius had chosen a subject naturally crabbed. Dryden.
 Your crabbed rogues that read Lucretius,
 Are against gods, you know. Prior.

 The mathematicks, with their crabbedness and intricacy, could not deter you. Howell, Lett. i. i. 9.

CRA'BBY.* adj. [from crab.] Difficult; crabbed; perplexing.

Persius is crabby, because ancient; and his jerks, being particularly given to private customs of his time, dusky.

Marston, Scourge of Villany.

CRA'DER. n. s.

The poor fish have enemies enough, beside such unnatural fishermen; as otters, the cormorant, and the craber, which some call the water-rat. Walton's Angler.

CRABS-EYES. n. s. Whitish bodies, rounded on one side and depressed on the other, heavy, moderately hard, and without smell. They are not the eyes of any creature, nor do they belong to the crab; but are produced by the common crawfish: the stones are bred in two separate bags, one on each side of the stomach. They are alkaline, absorbent, and in some degree diuretick. Hill.
 Several persons had, in vain, endeavoured to store themselves with crabs-eyes. Boyle.

CRACK.† n. s. [Fr. crac; Ir. crac, a loud sound; Dutch, krack.]

1. A sudden disruption, by which the parts are separated but a little way from each other.
2. The chink, fissure, or vacuity made by disruption; a narrow breach.

Contusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the skull, either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, or in the contrary part. Wiseman.

A length it would crack in many places; and those cracks, as they dilated, would appear of a pretty good, but yet obscure and dark sky-colour. Newton, Opticks.

3. The sound of any body bursting or falling.

If I say sooth, I must report, they were
 As cannons overcharg'd with double cracks.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Now day appears, and with the day the king,
 Whose early care had robb'd him of his rest;

Far off the cracks of falling houses ring,
 And shrieks of subjects pierce his tender breast. Dryden.

4. Any sudden and quick sound.

A fourth? — start eye!

What will the line stretch out to th' crack of doom?

Shakspeare.

Vulcan was employed in hammering out thunderbolts, that every now and then flew up from the anvil with dreadful cracks and flashes. Addison.

5. Change of the voice in puberty.

And let us, Paladour, though now our voices
 Have got the namish crack, sing him to th' ground.

Shakspeare.

I cannot Believe this crack to be in my dread mistress,
 So sovereignly being honourable. Shakspeare, Win. Tale.

7. Crazyiness of intellect.

8. A man crazed.

I have invented projects for raising millions, without burthening the subject; but cannot get the parliament to listen to me, who look upon me as a crack and a projector. Addison.

9. A whore; in low language.

10. A boast. [See the fourth sense of the verb neuter, To CRACK.]

Out of this fountain proceed all those cracks and brags.

Burton, Anal. of Mel. p. 122.

If the man and his modesty had not been long since parted, those idle cracks had never been.

Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Married Clergy, p. 186.

11. A boaster. This is only in low phrase.
12. An instant; as, the business shall be done in a crack. This also is only in low phrase.
13. A lad. [crack is an old Icelandick word signifying a boy or child. Tyrwhitt.]

I saw him break Seogan's head at the court gate, when he was a crack, not thus high. Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. p. II.
Fal. 'Tis a noble child.

Vir. A crack, madam. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Since we are turned cracks, let's study to be like cracks, not freely, carelessly, and capriciously. B. Jonson, Cyth. Revels.
 Here's a crack!

I think they suck this knowledge out of their milk.

Messenger, Unnat. Combat.

To CRACK.† v. a. [Fr. cracquer; Dutch, kracken.]

1. To break into chinks; to divide the parts a little from each other.

Look to your pipes, and cover them with fresh and warm litter out of the stable, a good thickness, lest the frost crack them. Mortimer.

2. To break; to split.

O, madam, my heart is crack'd, it's crack'd. Shakspeare.
 Thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reason but because thou hast basel eyes. Shakspeare.

Should some wild fig-tree take her native bent,

And heave below the gaudy monument,
 Would crack the marble tiles, and disperse
 The characters of all the lying verse.

Dryden, Jur.

Or as a lute, which in moist weather rings
 Her knell alone, by cracking of her strings.

Donne.

Honour is like that glassy bubble,
 That finds philosophers such trouble;
 Whose least part crack'd, the whole does fly,
 And wits are crack'd to find out why.

Hudibras.

3. To do any thing with quickness or smartness.

Let the Fauns, drawn from their groves, beware,
 Be I their judge, they do at no time dare,
 Like men street-born, and near the hall rehearse
 Their youthful tricks in over-wanton verse;
 Or crack out bawdy speeches, and unclean.

B. Jonson, Hor. Art. of Poetry.

Sir Balaam now, he lives like other folks;

He takes his chirping pint, he cracks his jokes. Pope.

4. To break or destroy any thing.

You'll crack a quart together! Ha, will you not.

Shakspeare.

Love cools, friendship falls off, brothers divide: in cities, mutinies; in countries, discord; in palaces, treason; and the bond cracked 'twixt son and father. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

5. To craze; to weaken the intellect.

I was ever of opinion, that the philosopher's stone, and an holy war, were but the rendezvous of cracked brains, that wore their feather in their heads. Bacon, Holy War.

He thought none poets till their brains were crack'd.

Roscommon.

To CRACK.† v. n.

1. To burst; to open in chinks.

By misfortune it cracked in the cooling, whereby we were reduced to make use of one part, which was straight and intire. Boyle.

2. To fall to ruin.

The credit not only of banks, but of exchequers, cracks
 when little comes in, and much goes out. Dryden.

3. To utter a loud and sudden sound.

I will board her, though she chide as loud
 As thunder, when the clouds in autumn crack. Shakspeare.

4. To boast: sometimes with of. [Germ. kraken; Dutch, kracken.] See TO CRAKE. It is still used in the north of England for "to brag or boast."

To look like her, are chimney-sweepers black,
And since her time are colliers counted bright;
And Ethiops of their sweet complexion crack.
Dark needs no candles now, for dark is light. Shakespeare.
Your very tradesmen, if they be excellent, will crack and brag, and shew their folly in excess.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 125.
The indifferent reader may easily discern, what may be thought of the cracking cardinal, who would face us down.

Abp. Usher, Answ. to the Jesuit Malone, p. 124.
Quakery cracks and boasts much of immediate inspirations.

Hallywell, Acc. of Familism, p. 126.

- CRACK-BRAINED. † adj. [crack and brained.] Crazy; without right reason.

A race of crack-brained schismatics do croak in every corner.

Howell, Lett. iv. 44.

They seem to be a pitiable, but crack-brained sort of men.
Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. 1.

We have sent you an answer to the ill-grounded sophisms of those crack-brained fellows.

Arbuthnot on Pope.

- CRACK-HEMP. n. s. [crack and hemp.] A wretch fated to the gallows; a crack-rope.

Furcifer.

Come hither, crack-hemp.

— I hope I may chuse, sir.

— Come hither, you rogue:

What, have you forgot me? Shakespeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

- CRACK-ROPE. n. s. [from crack and rope.] A fellow that deserves hanging.

- CRA'CKER. † n. s. [from crack. Dutch, kraccher.]

1. A noisy boasting fellow. [Gael. cracaire, a talker.]

What cracker is this same that deafs our ears

With this abundance of superfluous breath.

Shakespeare, K. John.

2. A quantity of gunpowder confined so as to burst with great noise.

Beat her into gunpowder,

She would make rare crackers. Beaumont and Fl. Women pleas'd.

The bladder, at its breaking, gave a great report, almost like a cracker.

Boyle.

And when, for furious haste to run,

They durst not stay to fire a gun,

Have don't with bonfires, and at home

Made squibs and crackers overcome.

Hudibras.

Then furious he begins his march,

Drives rattling o'er a brazen arch,

With squibs and crackers arm'd to throw

Among the trembling crowd below.

Swift.

3. That which cracks or breaks a thing.

Or chance to like

The nut-crackers throughout. B. Jonson, Hor. Art of Poetry.

- TO CRA'CKLE. v. n. [from crack.] To make slight cracks; to make small and frequent noises; to decrepitate.

All these motions, which we saw,

Are but as ice, which crackles at a thaw. Donne.

I fear to try new love,

As boys to venture on the unknown ice

That crackles underneath them. Dryden.

Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire;

Her crown and jewels crackled in the fire. Dryden, Æneid.

- CRA'CKLING. * n. s. [from the verb.] A small but frequent noise.

As the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of a fool.

Eccles. vii. 6.

Marrow is a specifick in that scurvy which occasions a crackling of the bones; in which case marrow performs its natural function of moistening them. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

- CRA'CKNEL. † n. s. [Craquelin, Fr. "a cracknell, made of the yolks of eggs, water, and flower, and fashioned like a hollow trencle." Cotgrave.] A hard brittle cake.

Albee my love he seek with daily suit,
His clownish gifts and curtsies I disdain,
His kids, his cracknels, and his early fruit.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Jan.

Take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels.

Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells;

And with our offerings, help to raise his vails. Dryden, Juv.

- CRA'DLE. † n. s. [crabel, Saxon.]

1. A moveable bed, on which children or sick persons are agitated with a smooth and equal motion, to make them sleep.

She had indeed, sir, a son for her cradle, ere she had a husband for her bed.

Shakespeare, K. Lear.

No jutting frieze,

Buttrice, nor coigne of vantage, but this bird,

Hath made his pendant bed and procreant cradle. Shakespeare.

His birth, perhaps, some paltry village hides,

And sets his cradle out of fortune's way. Dryden.

A child knows his nurse and his cradle, and by degrees the playthings of a little more advanced age.

Locke.

The radle and the tomb, alas! so nigh:

To live, is scarce distinguish'd from to die. Prior.

Me let the tender office long engage,

To rock the cradle of reposing age;

With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,

Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death. Pope.

2. It is used for infancy, or the first part of life.

He knew them to be inclined altogether to war, and therefore wholly trained them up, even from their cradles, in arms and military exercises. Spenser on Ireland.

The new duke's daughter, her cousin, loves her, being ever, from their cradles, bred together.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

They should scarcely depart from a form of worship, in which they had been educated from their cradle. Clarendon.

3. [With surgeons.] A case for a broken bone, to keep off pressure.

4. [With shipwrights.] A frame of timber raised along the outside of a ship by the bulge, serving more securely and commodiously to help to launch

her. Harris.

used in scraping mezzotintoes, and preparing the plate. Chambers.

6. [In husbandry.] A part often added to a scythe, in order to gather the corn into swaths, when it is mowed. Chambers.

- TO CRA'DLE. v. a. [from the substantive.] To lay in a cradle; to rock in a cradle.

He that hath been cradled in majesty, will not leave the throne to play with beggars. Glanville, Apol.

The tears steal from our eyes, when in the street

With some betrothed virgin's horse we meet;

Or infant's fun'ral from the cheated womb,

Convey'd to earth, and cradled in a tomb.

Dryden.

He shall be cradled in my ancient shield, so famous through the universities. Arbuthnot on Pope.

- TO CRA'DLE. * v. n. To lodge as in a cradle.

Wither'd roots, and husks,

Wherein the acorn cradled. Shakespeare, Tempest.

- CRA'DLE-CLOTHES. n. s. [from cradle and clothes.]

Bed clothes belonging to a cradle.

O that it could be prov'd,

That some night tripping fairy had exchange'd

In cradle-clothes our children where they lay,

And call mine Percy, his Plantagenet;

Then would I have his Harry, and he mine.

Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

- CRAFT. † n. s. [cræft, Sax. crefft, in old Welsh.]

1. Manual art; trade. [Touz les craftus du citee de

Londres, old Fr. all the craftsmen, companies, of London. Kelham.]

I hear an objection, even from some well-meaning men, that these delightful crafts may be divers ways ill applied in a land.
Wotton, Architecture.

2. Art; ability; dexterity.

A poem is the work of the poet, poesy is his skill or craft of making, the very fiction itself of the work. B. Jonson.

3. Fraud; cunning; artifice.

Th' offence is holy, that she hath committed;
 And this deceit beses the name of craft,
 Of disobedience, or unduteous title. Shakespeare.

This gives us a full view of wonderful art and craft in raising such a structure of power and iniquity. Ayliffe.

4. Small sailing vessels.

To CRAFT. v. n. [from the noun.] To play tricks; to practise artifice. Now out of use.

You've made fair hands,
 You and your crafts! You've crafted fair. Shakespeare, Coriol.

CRAFTILY. adv. [Sax. craftlice.] Our old adverb exactly corresponded with the Saxon: "craftilyke, or workmanly done." Huloet.

1. Cunningly; artfully; with more art than honesty.

But that which most impaired his credit was the common report that he did, in all things, favour the Christians; and had, for that cause, craftily persuaded Solyman to take in hand the unfortunate Persian war. Knolles.

May he not craftily infer
 The rules of friendship too severe,
 Which chain him to a hated trust;
 Which make him wretched to be just? Prior.

2. Skillfully. Obsolete.

On their heades bare
 Of divers flowers, made full craftely
 All in a sute, goodly chaplets they ware.
Chaucer, Fl. and Leaf.

CRAFTINESS. n. s. [from crafty.] Cunning; stratagem.

Such there are in this age, whose hearts are so framed to dwell in frowardness, as to say, that these be not the daies of innocencie: what, shall it then follow, that their wickedness would make them the daies of craftinesse? God forbid.

Knight, Trial of Truth, (1580.) fol. 51. b.

He taketh the wise in their own craftiness. Job. 5. 13.

CRAFTSMAN. n. s. [craft and man, Dr. Johnson says. But formerly it was crafty man, to denote this word in the sense of artificer: "A citee — whose crafti man and maker is God." Wicliffe, Heb. xi.] An artificer; a manufacturer; a mechanick.

That her became, as polish'd ivory,
 Which cunning craftsman's hand hath overlaid
 With fair vermillion. Spenser, F. Q.

What reverence he did throw away on slaves;
 Wooing poor craftsmen with the craft of smiles. Shakespeare.
 What a resemblance this advice carries to the oration of Demetrius to his fellow craftsmen! Decay of Piety.

CRAFTSMAN. n. s. [craft and master.] A man skilled in his trade.

He is not his craft's-master, he doth not do it right. Shakespeare.

As for alchymy and magick — the crafts and the craftsmasters are not only despised, but named with derision.

Sir T. Bodley to Bacon, Supp. to Cabala, p. 75.

There is art in pride: a man might as soon learn a trade. Those who were not brought up to it, seldom prove their craftsmaster. Collier on Pride.

CRAFTY. adj. [from craft.] Cunning; artful; full of artifices; fraudulent; sly.

Nay, you may think my love was crafty love,
 And call it cunning. Shakespeare, K. John.

This oppression did, of force and necessity, make the Irish a crafty people; for such as are oppressed, and live in slavery, are ever put to their shifts. Davies on Ireland.

Before he came in sight, the crafty god
 His wings dismiss'd, but still retain'd his rod. Dryden.

No body was ever so cunning as to conceal their being so; and every body is shy and distrustful of crafty men. Locke.

CRAIG. n. s.

1. Craig is, in British, a rough steep rock; and is used in the same sense in the northern counties at this day. Gibson. The Celt. craig is also a rock.

2. The rugged protuberances of rocks.

And as mount Etna vomits sulphur out,
 With cliffs of burning craigs, and fire and smoke. Fabfar.

Who hath dispos'd, but thou, the winding way,
 Where springs down from the steepy craigs do wait. Wotton.

A lion spied a goat upon the crag of a high rock
L'Estrange.

3. The neck. [kraze, Goth.]

They looken bigger as bulls that been bate,
 And bearen the crag so stiff and so state. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.

4. The small end of a neck of mutton: a low word.

CRA'GGED. adj. [from crag.] Full of inequalities and prominences.

On a huge hill,
Cragged and steep, truth stands. Crashaw
 The body becomes more uncomely, cragged, and crumpled; the bones stare through the skin; the flesh that should cover them, is wasted much away. Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 127.

CRA'GGEDNESS. n. s. [from cragged.] Fulness of craigs or prominent rocks.

That craggedness or steepness of that mountain, — maketh many parts of it in a manner inaccessible.

Brerewood on Lang. p. 176.

CRA'GGINESS. n. s. [from craggy.] The state of being craggy.

The cragginess and steepness of places up and down is a great advantage to the dwellers, and makes them inaccessible.

Howell, Instruct. For Trav. p. 132.

CRA'GGY. adj. [from crag.] Rugged: full of prominences; rough to walk on, or climb.

That same wicked wight
 His dwelling has low in an hollow cave,
 Far underneath a craggy cliff ypright,
 Dark, doleful, dreary, like a greedy grave. Spenser, F. Q.

It was impossible to pass up the woody and craggy hills, without the loss of those commanders. Raleigh, Essays.

Mountaineers that from Severus came,
 And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica. Dryden.

The town and republick of St. Marino stands on the top of a very high and craggy mountain. Addison on Italy.

CRACK. n. s. [See CRACK.] A hoast.

Crackings, backbitings, and vain-glorious crakes.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. xi. 10.

No perfectness of life, no crake of God's Word, no colour of religion, can please
 Almighty God, without the true and right faith.

Stapleton, Fort. of the Faith, (1565.) fol. 5. b.

To CRAKE. v. n. [from the noun.] To brag; to boast: sometimes with of.

Then she is mortal born, how so ye crake.
Spenser, F. Q. vii. vii. 50.

Nothing more proveth that all the light of the gospel, which they crake of, is more darkness, than to say, as they say, &c.

Stapleton, Fort. of the Faith, fol. 88.

Each man may crake of that which was his owne;
 Our parent's good is their's, and no whit our's:
 Who therefore will of noble birth be knowne,
 Of shine in virtue like his ancestors;
 Gentric consisteth not in lands and towers.

Mir. for Mag. p. 297.

To CRAKE. v. u. To utter boastingly, or with insult.

To whom the boaster, that all knights did blot,
 With proud disdain did scornfull answer make:—
 And further did uncomely speeches crake.

Spenser, F. Q. v. iii. 16.

CRA'KER.* n. s. [from crake.] A boaster; a bragger; a vaunter. Hudnot and Barret.

These barking whelps were never good biters,
No yet great crakers were ever great fighters.

Damon and Pythias, sign. E. iij.

To CRAM. v. a. [crumman, Saxon.]

1. To stuff; to fill with more than can conveniently be held.

As much love in rhyme,
As would be cramm'd up in a sheet of paper,
Writ on both sides the leaf, margent and all. Shakespeare.
Being thus cramm'd in the basket, a couple of Ford's knaves were called. Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

Thou hast spoke as if thy eldest son should be a fool, whose skull Jove cram with brains. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Cram not in people by sending too fast company after company;
but so as the number may live well in the plantation, and not by scorch be in pecuniary. Bacon.

2. To fill with food beyond satiety.

You'd mollify a judge, would cram a squire;
Or else some smiles from court you may desire. King.

I am sure children would be freer from diseases, if they were not cramm'd so much as they are by fond mothers, and were kept wholly from flesh the first three years. Locke.

As a man may be eating all day, and for want of digestion, is never nourished; so these endless readers may cram themselves in vain with intellectual food. Watts on the Mind.

But Annus, crafty seer,
Came cramm'd with capon, from where Pollio dines. Pope.

3. To thrust in by force.

You cram these words into mine ears, against
The stomach of my sense. Shakespeare, Tempest.

Huffer, quoth Hudibras, this sword
Shall down thy false throat cram that word. Hudibras.

Fate has cramm'd us all into one lease,
And that even now expiring. Dryden, Cleonomenes.

In another printed paper it is roundly expressed, that he will cram his brass down our throats. Swift.

To CRAM. v. n. To eat beyond satiety.

The godly dame, who fleshly failings damns,
Scolds with her maid, or with her chaplain crams. Pope.

CRA'MBO.* n. s. [a cant word, probably without etymology.] A play at which one gives a word, to which another finds a rhyme; a rhyme.

So Mævius, when he drain'd his skull
To celebrate some suburb trull,
His similes in order set,
And ev'ry crambo he could get. Swift.
Crowd is nothing but a botch, and a mere crambo to cloud.
Dennis on Pope's Homer.

On a late gratulating occasion, our very worthy vice-chancellor deigned to tag a rhyme; and our learned professors ply'd at crambo in Hebrew, Arabick, and Welsh.

The Student, ii. 225.

CRAMP. n. s. [krampe, Dut. crampe, French.]

1. A spasm or contraction of the limbs, generally removed by warmth and rubbing.

For this, besure, to-night thou shalt have cramps,
Side-stitches that shall peu thy breath up. Shakespeare, Tempest.

In a retreat, he outruns any lacquey; marry, in coming on,
he has the cramp. Shakespeare.

The cramp, cometh of contraction of sinews; which is manifest, in that it cometh either by cold or dryness.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Hares, said to live on hemlock, do not make good the tradition;
and he that observes what vertiges, cramps, and convulsions follow thereon, in these animals, will be of our belief.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. A restriction; a confinement; obstruction; shackle.

A narrow fortune is a cramp to a great mind, and lays a man under incapacities of serving his friend. L'Estrange.

3. A piece of iron bent at each end, by which two bodies are held together.

To the uppermost of these there should be fastened a sharp grapple, or cramp of iron, which may be apt to take hold of any place where it lights. Wilkins.

CRAMP.* adj. [perhaps it should be cramp'd, or cramp'd, from the verb.] Difficult; knotty; a low term.

With a little patience and attention you shall find those phrases very intelligible, and neither to be nonsense, or gibberish, nor cramp words to conceal a conceited ignorance under,
as your old friends the epicureans are wont to call them.

Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

To CRAMP.* v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To pain with cramps or twitches.

When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, ev'n then
A wat'rish humour swell'd, and ooz'd again. Dryden, Virgil.

2. To restrain; to confine; to obstruct; to hinder.

It is impossible to conceive the number of inconveniences that will ensue, if borrowing be cramp'd. Bacon.

There are few but find that some companies benumb and cramp them, so that in them they can neither speak nor do any thing that is handsome. Glanville, Scopsis.

He, who serves, has still restraints of dread upon his spirits, which, even in the midst of action, cramps and ties up his activity. South, Sermon.

Dr. Hammond loves to contract and cramp the sense of prophecies. Burnet, Theory.

The antiquaries are for cramping their subjects into as narrow a space as they can, and for reducing the whole extent of a science into a few general maxims. Addison on Italy.

Marinus used all endeavours for depressing the nobles, and raising the people; particularly for cramping the former in their power of judicature. Swift.

No more

The expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold,
But full of life, and vivifying soul. Thomson, Spring.

3. To bind with crampirons.

The diversified but connected fabrick of universal justice is well cramp'd and bolted together in all its parts.

Burke, Speech at Bristol, 1780.

CRAMP-FISH.* n. s. [from cramp and fish.] The torpedo, which benumbs the hands of those that touch it.

The torpedo or cramp-fish also came to land; a fish, if Pliny writes truth, that by hiding itself with mud and dirt catches lesser fish very strangely; for by his frigidity he benums such fish as swim over or lodge near him.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 384.

CRA'MPIRON.* n. s. [from cramp and iron.] See

CRAMP, Sense 3.

The cramp-irons, that it moves on still,
Are the good motions of the will.

Watson, Hist. of the Art of Printing.

CRA'NAGE. n. s. [cranagium, low Latin.] A liberty to use a crane for drawing up wares from the vessels, at any creek of the sea or wharf, unto the land, and to make profit of it. It signifies also the money paid and taken for the same. Cowel.

CRA'NBERRY.* n. s. The whortle-berry, or bilberry. See BILBERRY.

To CRANCH.* v. a. [See To CRAUNCH.] To crush in the mouth.

She cannot shoot at butts,
Or manage a great horse; but she can cranch
A sack of small coal, eat you lime and hair,
Soap-ashes, loam; and has a dainty spice
O' the green-sickness. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CRANE. n. s. [cpan, Sax. kraen, Dutch.]

1. A bird with a long beak.

Like a crane, or a swallow, so did I chatter. Isaiah, xxxviii. 14.

That small infantry warr'd on by cranes. Milton, P. L.

2. An instrument made with ropes, pullies, and hooks, by which great weights are raised.

In case the mould about it be so ponderous as not to be removed by any ordinary force, you may then raise it with a crane. Mortimer.

Then commerce brought into the publick walk
The busy merchant, the big warehouse built,
Rais'd the strong crane. Thomson, Autumn.

3. A siphon; a crooked pipe for drawing liquors out of a cask.

CRANE-FLY. * n. s. A name given by some to the creature we call father-long-legs. Chambers.

CRANES-BILL. n. s. [from crane and bill.]

1. An herb.

2. A pair of pincers terminating in a point, used by surgeons.

CRANIUM. n. s. [Latin.] The skull.

In wounds made by contusion, when the cranium is a little naked, you ought not presently to crowd in drossils; for if that contused flesh be well digested, the bone will incrust with the wound without much difficulty. Wiseman, Surgery.

CRANK. † n. s. [This word is perhaps a contraction of crane-neck, to which it may bear some resemblance, and is part of the instrument called a crane, Dr. Johnson says. But it is Saxon; cranġtæf, an instrument for weavers.]

1. A crank is the end of an iron axis turned square down, and again turned square to the first turning down; so that, on the last turning down, a leather thong is slit to tread the treadle-wheel about. Moxon.

2. Any bending or winding passage.

I send it through the rivers of your blood,
Even to the court, the heart; to the seat o' the brain;
And, through the cranks and offices of man,
The strongest nerves, and small inferiour veins,
From me receive that natural competency,
Whereby they live. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Like a young pine,
He grows up planted under a fair oak,
Whose strong large branches yet do shelter him;
And every traveller admires his beauty;
But like a wind, I'll woe into his cranks,
Trouble his stream, and drown all vessels that Ride on his greatness. Beaumont and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

Meet you no ruin, but the soldier in
The cranks and turns of Thebes?

The politick heart is too full of cranks and angles for the discovery of a plain familiar. Feltham, Res. i. 83.

3. Any conceit formed by twisting or changing, in any manner, the form or meaning of a word.

I know not by what stratagem, or cunning crank of the schools, you can be made agreeable to yourself.

Hayward, Answ. to Doleman, ch. i.

Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek.

To shew us the ways of the Lord straight and faithful as they are, not full of cranks and contradictions.

4. An impostor. Obsolete.

A lawyer of Bruges hath some notable examples of such counterfeit cranks; and every village almost will yield abundant testimonies amongst us; we have dummerers, Abraham-men, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 159.

Thou art a counterfeit crank, a cheater. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 436.

CRANK. † adj. [from onkranch, Dutch, i. e. not sick, Skinner. Serenius refers it to the W. Goth. kranger, bold, daring.]

1. Healthy; sprightly: sometimes corrupted to cranky. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says, citing the solitary instance of Spenser. Yet the word has other good authorities; and it is still used in Kent for merry.

They look'd bigge, as bulls that been bate,
And bearen the cragg so stiff and so statu,
As cocke on his dunghill crowing crank.

For I was a crank wit a brisk young boy. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sep.

How can they to grow so extremely crank and confident? More, Song of the Soul, i. i. 121.

2. Among sailors, a ship is said to be crank, when, by the form of its bottom, or by being loaded too much above, it is liable to be overset. [from kranch, Dut. sick, which is from the Cimbr. krank.]

We use the Dutch word crank, in English, "to be well-disposed," which in the original signifieth to be sick.

Howell, Lett. iv. 19.
To CRANK. * v. n. [from the noun.] To turn, to run in and out. The following passage in Shakspeare's Henry the Fourth has been cited by Dr. Johnson to illustrate the verb crankle; but that is not the true reading, though it is found in some editions. Pope altered the word, to crankling.

See how this river comes me cranking in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land
A huge half-moon, a monstrous cante out.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV.
The purblind hare —
How he out-runs the wind, and with what care
He cranks and crosses, with a thousand doubles.

Shakspeare, Ven. and Adon.
To CRA'NKLE. † v. n. [from crank, as it signifies something bent.] To run in and out; to run in flexures and windings.

Meander, who is said so intricate to be,
Hath not so many turns, nor crankling nooks, as she. [The Wye.]
Drayton, Polyolb. S 7.

Now on along the crankling path doth keep,
Then by a rock turns up another way. Drayton, Baron's Wars, b. 6.

To CRA'NKLE. v. a. To break into unequal surfaces; to break into angles.

Old Vaga's stream,
For'd by the sudden shock, her wonted track
Forsook, and drew her humd train aslope,
Crankling her banks. Philips.

CRA'NKLES. n. s. [from the verb.] Inequalities; angular prominences.

CRA'NKNESS. n. s. [from crank.]

1. Health; vigour.
2. Disposition to overset.

CRA'NNIED. adj. [from cranny.] Full of chinks.

A wall it is, as I would have you think,
That had in it a crannied hole or chink. Shakspeare.
A very fair fruit, and not unlike a citron; but somewhat rougher chopt and crannied, vulgarly conceived the marks of Adam's teeth. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CRA'NNY. n. s. [from cren, Fr. crena, Lat.] A chink; a cleft; a fissure.

The eye of the understanding is like the eye of the sense, for as you may see great objects through small crannies or holes, so you may see great axioms of nature through small and contemptible instances.

And therefore beat, and laid about,
To find a cranny to creep out. Hudibras.

In a firm building, the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, but with brick or stone, fitted to the crannies. Dryden.
Within the soaking of water and springs, with streams and currents in the veins and crannies. Burnet, Theory.

He skipped from room to room, ran up stairs and down stairs, from the kitchen to the garrets, and he peeped into every cranny. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

CRANTS. * n. s. [Germ. krantz, garlands; Ice. krans, a wreath or chaplet. V. Ihre, Gloss. Su. Goth.]

The garlands carried before the bier of a maiden, and hung over her grave. Not wholly discontinued in this country. Warburton changed this word into chants, as others had into rites. But crants is the true word.

Yet here she is allow'd her virgin crants,
Her maiden strewments, and the bringing home
Of bell and burial. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CRAPE.† n. s. [crespe and crepe, Fr. crepa, low Lat.] A thin stuff, loosely woven, of which the dress of the clergy is sometimes made.

And proud Roxana, fir'd with jealous rage,
With fifty yards of cape shall sweep the stage. Swift.

To thee I often call'd in vain,
Against that assassin in cape. Swift.

'Tis from high life high characters are drawn;
A saint in cape twice a saint in lawn. Pope.

CRA'PLE.* n. s. [Germ. krappeln, to seize.] A ciaw.
Soone as they did the monstrous Scorpion view
With ugly craples crawling in their way,
The dreadfull sight did them so sore affray,
That their well-known courses they forwent.

Spenser, F. Q. v. viii. 40.

And still he thought he felt their craples tare
Him by the heels back to his ougly den.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Vict. B. 2.

CRA'PULA.* n. s. [Lat. from the Gr. κρανιάλη, which is from κεφαλή, the head, and πάλλω, to shake.] A surfeit, or sickness by intemperance.

The drunkard now supinely snores,
His load of ale sweats thro' his pores,
Yet when he wakes, the swine shall find,
A crapula remains behind. Cotton, Night Quatrains.

CRA'PULENCE. n. s. [crapula, a surfeit, Latin.] Drunkenness; sickness by intemperance. Dict.

CRA'PULOUS. adj. [crapulosus, Lat.] Drunken; intemperate; sick with intemperance. Dict.

To CRASE.* See To CRAZE.

To CRASH.† v. n. [a word probably formed from the thing, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps it may be from the Fr. croissir, "to crack, or crash; to crackle, as wood that's ready to break." Cotgrave.] To make a loud complicated noise, as of many things falling or breaking at once.

When convulsions cleave the lab'ring earth,
Before the dismal yawn appears, the ground
Trembles and heaves, the nodding houses crash. Smith.

To CRASH.† v. a. To break or bruise. This is one of our old verbs; but it is not in Shakspeare, as cited by Dr. Johnson; for the poet reads "crush a cup of wine," and not crash. See To CRUSH. Our word, in the sense of break, is traced by Serenius to the Goth. krassa, to tear. We have an expression, "to crash the teeth for anger; to grind the teeth." Barret's Alvearie; which squares with the old Fr. See Lacombe in V. Croussi, croquer, grincer les dents, craquer." We may compare also the Fr. ccraser.

CRASH. n. s. [from the verb.] A loud sudden mixed sound, as of many things broken at the same time.

Senseless Kium,
Seeming to feel this blow, with flaming top
Stoops to his base; and, with a hideous crash, Takes prisoner Pyrrhus' ear. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Moralizing sat I by the hazard table: I look'd upon the uncertainty of riches, the decay of beauty, and the crash of worlds, with as much contempt as ever Plato did. Pope.

CRA'SHING.* n. s. [from crash.] A violent, complicated noise.

There shall be the noise of a cry from the fish-gate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills. Zeph. i. 10.

CRASIS. n. s. [κράσις.] Temperature; constitution arising from the various properties of humours.

The fancies of men are so immediately diversified by the individual crasis, that every man owns something wherein none is like him. Glanville.

A man may be naturally inclined to pride, lust, and anger, as these inclinations are founded in a peculiar crasis, and constitution of the blood and spirits. South.

CRASS.† adj. [old Fr. cras, gras; Lat. crassus.] Gross; coarse; not thin; not comminuted; not subtle; not consisting of small parts.

Iron in aquafortis, will fall into ebullition, with noise and emication; as also a crass and fuid exhalation caused from the combat of the sulphur of iron with the acid and nitrous spirits of aquafortis. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A cloud of folly and distraction darkens the soul, and makes it crass and material. Bp. Taylor, Sermon. (1653.) p. 208.

Metals are intermixed with the common terrestrial matter, so as not to be discoverable by human industry; or, if discoverable, so diffused and scattered amongst the crasser and more unprofitable matter, that it would never be possible to separate and extract it. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CRA'SSIMENT.* n. s. [Lat. crassamentum.] Thickness.

Now, as the bones are principally here intended, so also all the other solid parts of the body, that are made of the same crassiment of seed, may be here included.

Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 179.

CRA'SSITUDE. n. s. [crassitudo, Latin.] Grossness; coarseness; thickness.

They must be but thin, as a leaf, or a piece of paper or parchment; for if they have a greater crassitude, they will alter in their own body, though they spend not. Bacon.

The Dead Sea, which vomiteth up bitumen, is of that crassitude, as living bodies, bound hand and foot, cast into it, have been born up, and not sunk. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The terrestrial matter carried by rivers into the sea, is sustained therein partly by the greater crassitude and gravity of the sea-water, and partly by its constant agitation. Woodward.

CRA'SSNESS.* n. s. [from crass.] Grossness.

The ethereal body contracts crassness and impurity by the same degrees as the immaterial faculties abate in their exercise.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 118.

CRASTINATION. n. s. [from cras, Latin, to-morrow.] Delay. Dict.

CRATCH.† n. s. [Fr. creicche, Lat. crates. One of our oldest substantives. "She leyde him in a cracche, &c." Wicliffe, St. Luke, ii.] The palisaded frame in which hay is put for cattle.

When being expelled out of Paradise, by reason of sin, thou wert held in the chains of death; I was inclosed in the virgin's womb, I was laid in the cratch, I was wrapped in swathing-cloaths. Hakewill on Providence.

We see the Son of God, the God of all the world, in the form of a servant: not a cratch to cradle him in, not a grave to bury him in, was his own. Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 16.

Our meats and our sports (much of them) have relation to church-works. The coffin of our christmas-pics in shape long, is in imitation of the cratch. Selden, Table-Talk.

To CRATCH.* v. a. [our old verb for scratch; Welsh, crach, scabies. But see To SCRATCH.] To tear; as, "to cratch out one's eyes." Hulot.

CRATER.* n. s. [Lat.] A vent, or aperture; a passage at which any thing is let out.

This mount, I could see, was made of the stones thrown up and fallen back again into the crater.

Berkeley to Arbuthnot, Descrip. of Vesuvius, 1717.

CRATE.* n. s. [Germ. kraet, a basket.] A pannier, or wicker vessel, in which things are carried on a horse.

1. A shire; that is, a circuit or portion of the realm, into which the whole land is divided, for the administration of justice; so that there is no part of the kingdom, but what lieth within some county. Every county is governed by a yearly officer, called a sheriff, who puts in execution all the commands and judgements of the king's courts. Of these counties four are termed county-palatines, as that of Lancaster, Chester, Durham, and Ely. A county-palatine is a jurisdiction of so high a nature, that the chief governours of these, by special charter from the king, sent out all writs in their own name, and did all things touching justice as absolutely as the prince himself, only acknowledging him their superiour and sovereign. But this power has, by a statute in Henry VIII. his time, been much abridged. There are likewise counties corporate, which are certain cities or ancient boroughs upon which our princes have thought good to bestow extraordinary liberties. Of these London is one, York another, the city of Chester a third, and Canterbury a fourth. And to these may be added many more; as the county of the town of Kingston upon Hull, the county of the town of Haverfordwest, and the county of Litchfield. County is, in another signification, used for the county-court.

Discharge your powers unto their several counties,
As we will ours. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

He caught his death the last county sessions, where he would go to see justice done to a poor widow-woman, and her fatherless children. Addison, Spect.

2. An earldom.

Brave impe of Bedford, grow apace in bountie,
And count of wisdom more than of thy countie!
Spenser, Ruins of Time.

3. A count; a lord. [old Fr. countie.] Now wholly obsolete.

The gallant, young, and noble gentleman,
The county Paris. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

He made Hugh Lupus county palatine of Chester, and gave that earldom to him and his heirs, to hold the same ita liberè ad gladium sicut rex tenebat Angliam ad coronam. Davies.

- COUNTY-COURT.* See COUNTY. It is a court incident to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. It is not a court of record, but may hold pleas of debt or damages under forty shillings. Blackstone.

- COUP-DE-MAIN.* n. s. [Fr.] A military expression, denoting an instantaneous, an unexpected, and generally a desperate attack. It is sometimes applied to any thing which is transacted with promptness and vigour.

The upper fort maintained its defence, and the attack was relinquished. It seems it could only have been carried by a coup de main, which unluckily failed.

Guthrie, India within the Ganges.

- COUP-D'OEIL.* n. s. [Fr.] The first view of any thing; a slight view of it.

Only figure to yourself a vast semicircular basin, full of fine blue sea, and vessels of all sorts and sizes, &c. This is the first coup d'oeil, and is almost all I am yet able to give you an account of. Gray, Lett. to West, from Genoa, 1739.

- COUPEE. n. s. [French.] A motion in dancing, when one leg is a little bent and suspended from the ground, and with the other a motion is made forwards. See COOPEE. Chambers.

- CO'UPING-GLASS.* See CUPPING-GLASS.

- CO'UPABLE.* adj. [Fr. accouplable.] Fit to be coupled with. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

- COUPLE. n. s. [couple, Fr. copula, Latin.]

1. A chain or tie that holds dogs together.

I'll keep my stables where
I lodge my wife; I'll go in couple with her,
Than when I feel and see her, no further trust her. Shakespeare.
It is in some sort with friends as it is with dogs in *couple*s;
they should be of the same size and humour. L'Estrange.

2. Two; a brace.

He was taken up by a couple of shepherds, and by them brought to life again. Sidney.

A schoolmaster, who shall teach my son and yours, I will provide; yea, though the three do cost me a couple of hundred pounds. Ascham.

A piece of chrysal inclosed a couple of drops, which looked like water when they were shaken, though perhaps they are nothing but bubbles of air. Addison on Italy.

By adding one to one, we have the complex idea of a couple. Locke.

3. A male and his female.

So shall all the *couple*s three,
Ever true in loving be. Shakespeare, M. N. Dream.

Oh! alas!

I lost a couple, that 'twixt heaven and earth
Might thus have stood, begetting wonder, as

You gracious couple do. Shakespeare, Win. Tale.

I have read of a feigned commonwealth, where the married couple are permitted, before they contract, to see one another naked. Bacon, New Atlantis.

He said: the careful couple join their tears,
And then invoke the gods with pious prayers. Dryden.

All succeeding generations of men are the progeny of one primitive couple. Bentley's Sermons.

- To COUPLE. v. a. [old Fr. coupler, accoupler, joindre; Roq. copula, Lat.]

1. To chain together.

Hunt-man, I charge thee, tender well my hounds;
And couple Clowder with the deep-mouth'd Brach. Shakespeare.

2. To join one to another.

What greater ills have the heavens in store,
To couple coming horns with sorrow past Sidney.

And where-so'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still we went coupled and inseparable. Shakespeare, As you like it.

Put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together, that it may be one. Erad. xxvi. 1.

They behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear. 1 Pet. iii. 2.

Their concernments were so coupled, that if nature had not, yet their religions would have made them brothers. South.

That man makes a mean figure in the eyes of reason, who is measuring syllables and coupling rhimes, when he should be mending his own soul, and securing his own immortality. Pope.

3. To marry; to wed; to join in wedlock.

I shall rejoice to see you so coupled, as may be fit both for your honour and your satisfaction. Sidney.

I am just going to assist with the archbishop, in degrading a parson who *couple*s all our beggars, by which I shall make one happy man. Swift.

- To COUPLE. v. n. To join in embraces.

Waters in Africa being rare, divers sorts of beasts come from several parts to drink; and so being refreshed, fall to couple, and many times with several kinds. Bacon.

Thou, with thy lusty crew,
Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men;
And coupled with them, and begot a race. Milton, P. R.

After this alliance,
Let tigers match with hinds, and wolves with sheep,
And every creature couple with his foe. Dryden, Span. Fryar.

- COUPLE-BEGGAR. n. s. [couple and beggar.] One that makes it his business to marry beggars to each other.

No couple-beggar in the land,
E'er join'd such numbers hand in hand. Swift.

- CO'UPLEMENT.* n. s. [from couple.] Union; two or more together. Not now in use. Mr. Malone believed this word to be of Shakspeare's invention; but Spenser is before him. Some editions of Shakspeare's Sonnets have converted it into compliment.

After all which up to their steeds they went,
And forth together rode, a goodly couplement.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. v. 24.

Making a couplement of proud compare
With sun and moon, with earth and sea's rich gems.

Shakspeare, Sonn. xxi.

COUPLÉT. n. s. [French.]

1. Two verses; a pair of rhimes.

Then would they cast away their pipes, and, holding hand
In hand, dance by the only cadence of their voices, which they would use in singing some short couplets, whereto the one half beginning, the other half should answer. Sidney.

Then at the last, an only couplet fraught
With some unmeaning thing they call a thought;
A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along. Pope.

In Pope I cannot read a line,
But with a sigh I wish it mine;
When he ran in one couplet fix,
More sense than I can do in ten,
It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, plox take him and his wit.

Swift.

2. A pair; as of doves.

Anon, as patient as the female dove,
Ere that her golden couplets are disclosed,
His silence will sit drooping. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

COUPLING. n. s. [from couple.]

1. A junction.

To the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings. 2 Chron. xxxiv. vi.

2. Junction in embrace.

That great variety of brutes in Africa, is by reason of the meeting together of brutes of several species, at water, and the promiscuous couplings of males and females of several species.

Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

COURAGE. n. s. [old Fr. corage; modern, courage; low Lat. coragium; from cor, the heart. Spenser repeatedly uses courage for heart or mind. This word is rarely found in the plural; but Shakspeare gives it in his Cymbeline: "Their discipline now mingled with their courages;" which Dr. Johnson, however, has, in all the editions of his dictionary, printed courage.] Bravery; active fortitude; spirit of enterprise.

The king becoming graces,
Devotion, patience, courage, fortitude;
I have no relish of them. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Hope arms their courage; from their towers they thrice
Their darts with double force, and drive the foe. Dryden.

Courage, that grows from constitution, very often forsakes a man when he has occasion for it; and when it is only a kind of instinct in the soul, it breaks out on all occasions, without judgement or discretion. That courage which arises from the sense of our duty, and from the fear of offending Him that made us, acts always in an uniform manner, and according to the dictates of right reason. Addison, Guardian.

Nothing but the want of common courage was the cause of their misfortune. Swift.

To CO'URAGE. n. a. [from the noun. An old verb in our language, unjustly slighted and forgotten.
"To courage, or to make audacious, addere animum, vel audaciam." Huloet.] To encourage.

Moreover, charge Josiah, and courage him, and bolder him.

Deut. iii. 28. Mathew's Transl.

COURAGEOUS. adj. [old Fr. or Norm. courageux, angry, Kelham; courageux, courageous, Cotgrave.]

1. Brave; daring; bold; enterprising; adventurous; hardy; stout.

And he that is courageous among the mighty, shall flee away naked in that day. Amos, ii. 16.

Let us imitate the courageous example of St. Paul, who chose then to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it.

Alterbury.

2. It is used ludicrously by Shakspeare for outrageous.
He is very courageous mad, about his throwing into the water. Shakspeare.

COURAGEOUSLY. adv. [from courageous.] Bravely;
stoutly; boldly.

Deal courageously; and the Lord shall be with the good.

2 Chron. xix. vii.

The king the next day presented him battle upon the plain,
the fields there being open and champaign: the earl courageously came down, and joined battle with him.

Bacon, Hen. VII.

Endeavour resolutely and courageously to repel temptations, as often as they solicit thee. Hammond's Works, iv. 563.

COURAGEOUSNESS. n. s. [from courageous.] Bravery; boldness; spirit; courage.

Nicknor hearing of the manliness and the courageousness that they had to fight for their country, durst not try the matter by the sword. 2 Mac. xiv. 18.

COURANT. n. s. [from courante, Fr.] See CORANT.

1. A nimble dance.

I'll like a maid the better, while I have a tooth in my head: why, he is able to lead her a couranto. Shakspeare.

2. Any thing that spreads quick, as a paper of news.

The weekly courants with Paul's seal; and all
Th' admir'd discourses of the prophet Ball.

B. Jonson, Underwoods.

New books every day, pamphlets, courantos, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader.

My distempered old acquaintance read, in the next place, the account of the affairs abroad in the courant. Tuller, No. 178.

To COURB. v. n. [from courber, Fr.] To bend; to bow;

to stoop in supplication. Not in use.

In the fatness of these pury times,
Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,

Yea, courb and woo, for leave to do it good.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

COURB. adj. Crooked. See CORB.

Her neck is short, her shoulders courb. Gower, Conf. Am.

CO'URIER. n. s. [from courier, Fr.] A messenger sent in haste; an express; a runner.

I met a courier, one mine ancient friend.

Shakspeare, Timon.

This thing the wary bassa well perceiving, by speedy couriers advertised Solyman of the enemy's purpose, requesting him with all speed to repair with his army to Tauris. Knolles, Hist.

COURSE. n. s. [from course, Fr. cursus, Lat.]

1. Race; career.

And some she arms with sinewy force,

And some with swiftness in the course.

Cowley.

2. Passage from place to place; progress. To this may be referred the course of a river.

And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais. Acts, xxi. 7.

Like as a ship, that through the ocean wide

Directs her course unto one certain coast,

Is met of many a counter wind and tide.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 1.

A light, by which the Argive squadron steers
Their silent course to Ilium's well known shore. Denham.

3. Tilt; act of running in the lists.

But this hot knight was cooled with a fall, which, at the third course, he received of Phalantus. Sidney.

4. Ground on which a race is run.

5. Track or line in which a ship sails, or any motion is performed.

6. Sail; means by which the course is performed.

To the courses we have devised studding-sails, sprit-sails, and top-sails. Raleigh, Ess.

7. Progress from one gradation to another; process.

When the state of the controversy is plainly determined, it must not be altered by another disputant in the course of the disputation. Watts.

8. Order of succession; as, every one in his course.

Their officers that served the king in any matter of the courses, which came in and went out, month by month;—of every course was twenty and four thousand. Chron. xxvii. 1.

If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and that by course; and let one interpret. 1 Cor. xiv. 27.

9. Stated and orderly method, or manner.

If she live long,
And in the end meet the old course of death,
Women will all turn monsters. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

The duke cannot deny the course of law. Shakespeare.

If God, by his revealed declaration, first gave rule to any man, he, that will claim by that title, must have the same positive grant of God for his succession; for, if it has not directed the course of its descent and conveyance, no body can succeed to this title of the first Ruler. Locke.

10. Series of successive and methodical procedure.

The glands did resolve during her course of physick, and she continueth very well to this day. Wigan, Surgery.

11. The elements of an art exhibited and explained, in a methodical series. Hence our courses of philosophy, anatomy, chemistry, and mathematicks.

Chambers.

12. Conduct; manner of proceeding.

Grutus perceiving the danger he was in, began to doubt with himself what course were best for him to take. Roades.

That worthy deputy finding nothing but a common misery, took the best course he possibly could to establish a commonwealth in Ireland. Davies on Ireland.

He placed commissioners there, who governed it only in a course of discretion, part martial, part civil. Davies on Ireland.

Give willingly what I can take by force;

And know, obedience is your safest course. Dryden, Aureng.

But if a right course be taken with children, there will not be so much need of common rewards and punishments. Locke.

'Tis time we should decree

What course to take. Addison, Cato.

The senate observing how, in all contentions, they were forced to yield to the tribunes and people, thought it their wisest course to give way also to time. Swift.

13. Method of life; train of actions.

A woman of so working a mind, and so vehement spirits, as it was happy she took a good course; for otherwise it would have been terrible. Sidney.

His addiction was to courses vain;
His companies, unletter'd, rude and shallow;
His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports.

Shakespeare, Hen. V.

As the dropsy-man, the more he drinks, the drier he is, and the more he still desires to drink; even so a sinner, the more he sins, the apter he is to sin, and more desirous to keep still a course in wickedness. Perkins.

Men will say,

That beauteous Emma vagrant courses took,
Her father's house, and civil life forsook. Prior.

14. Natural bent; uncontrolled will.

It is best to leave nature to her course, who is the sovereign physician in most diseases. Temple.

So every servant took his course,
And, bad at first, they all grew worse. Prior.

15. Catamenia.

The stoppage of women's courses, if not suddenly looked to, sets them undoubtedly into a consumption, dropsy, or some other dangerous disease. Harvey on Consumptions.

16. Orderly structure.

The tongue defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature. James, iii. 6.

17. [In architecture.] A continued range of stones, level or of the same height, throughout the whole length of the building, and not interrupted by any aperture.

Harris.

18. Series of consequences.

19. Number of dishes set on at once upon the table.

Worthy sir, thou bleed'st:

Thy exercise hath been too violent
For a second course of fight. Shakespeare, Coriol.

Then with a second course the tables load,
And with full chargers offer to the god. Dryden, Æn.

You are not to wash your hands, 'till after you have sent up your second course. Swift, Direct. to the Cook.

So quick retires each flying course, you'd swear
Sancho's dread doctor and his wand was there. Pope.

20. Regularity; settled rule.

21. Empty form.

Men talk as if they believed in God, but they live as if they thought there was none; their vows and promises are no more than words of course. L'Estrange.

22. The running of dogs upon bears. A phrase of bear-baiting times; whether it belongs to the no less savage practice of modern bull-baiting, I am unable to say.

They have tied me to a stake; I cannot fly,
But, bear-like, I must fight the course. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

23. Of course. By consequence.

With a mind unprepossessed by doctors and commentators of any sect, whose reasonings, interpretation and language, which I have been used to, will of course make all chime that way; and make another, and perhaps the genuine meaning of the author, seem harsh, strained, and uncouth to me. Locke.

24. Of course. By settled rule.

Sense is of course annex'd to wealth and power;
No muse is proof against a golden show'r. Garth.
Neither shall I be so far wanting to myself, as not to desire a patent, granted of course to all useful projectors. Swift.

To COURSE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To hunt; to pursue.

The big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase. Shakespeare, As you like it.
The king is hunting the deer; I am coursing myself. Shakespeare, L. L. Lost.

Where's the thane of Cawdor?

We cours'd him at the heels, and had a purpose
To be his purveyor. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

2. To pursue with dogs that hunt in view.

I am continually starting hares for you to course: we were certainly cut out for one another; for my temper quits an amour just where thine takes it up. Congreve, Old Bachelor.

3. To put to speed; to force to run.

When they have an appetite
To venery, let them not drink nor eat,
And course them off, and tire them in the heat. May, Farg.

To COURSE. v. n. To run: to rove about.

Swift as quicksilver it courses through
The natural gates and allies of the body. Shakespeare, Hamlet.
The blood, before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inwards to the parts extreme. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

She did so course o'er my exterior, with such a greedy intention, that the appetite of her eye did seem to scorch me up like a burning glass. Shakespeare, M. W. of Windsor.

Ten brace and more of greyhounds, snowy hair,
And tall as stags, ran loose, and cours'd about his chair. Dryden.

All, at once

Relapsing quick, as quickly recover'd
And mix, and thwart, extinguish, and renew,
All ether coursing in a maze of light. Thomson, Autumn.

CO'URSER. v. n. [from course; coursier, French.]

1. A swift horse; a war-horse: a word not used in prose.

He proudly pricketh on his courser strong,
And Atin ay him pricks with spurs of shame and wrong. Spenser, F. Q.

Then to his absent guest the king decreed
A pair of courcers, born of heavenly breed;
Who from their nostrils breath'd ethereal fire,
Whom Circe stole from her celestial fire. Dryden, Æn.

The impatient courser pants in every vein,
And, pawing, seems to beat the distant plain;
Hills, vales, and floods appear already cross'd,
And, ere he starts, a thousand steps are lost. Pope.

2. One who pursues the sport of coursing hares; "a runner; a courser." See Cotgrave in V. COUREUR.

I am no hawd, nor a cheater, nor a courser
Of broken-winded women. Beaumont and Fl. The Captain.

A leach is a leathern thong, by which a falconer holds his hawk, or a courser leads his greyhound. Hanmer.

3. He who discourses upon a subject, and pursues it; a disputant. See the 11th sense of COURSE.

He was accounted a noted sophister, and remarkable courser in the time of Lent in the public schools.

Life of A. Wood, p. 109.

CO'URSEY. n. s. [Fr. coursic.]* Part of the hatches in a galley. Sherwood.

CO'URSING. n. s.* See TO COURSE. The sport of hunting hares, foxes, and sometimes deer, with greyhounds.

It would be tried also in flying of hawks, or in coursing of a deer, or hart, with greyhounds. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COURT. n. s. [old Fr. court, mod. cour; Goth. kurt, civility of manners; Sax. cūpt; Dutch, koert; low Lat. curtis. See COURTEOUS.]*

1. The place where the prince resides; the palace.

Of court, it seems, men courtesie do call,
For that it there most useth to abound. Spenser, F. Q. vi. i. 1.

Here do you keep a hundred knights and squires,
Men so disorderly, so debauch'd and bold,
That this our court, infected with their manners,
Shews like a riotous inn; Epicurism and lust,
Make it more like a tavern, or a brothel,
Than a grac'd palace. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

It shall be an habitation of dragons, and a court for owls.

Isaiah, xxvi. 13.

His exactness, that every man should have his due, was such, that you would think he had never seen a court: the politeness with which this justice was administered, would convince you he never had lived out of one. Prior, Dedication.

A suppliant to your royal court I come. Pope, Odyssey.

2. The hall or chamber where justice is administered.

Are you acquainted with the difference
That holds this present question in the court? Shakspeare.

St. Paul being brought unto the highest court in Athens, to give an account of the doctrine he had preached, concerning Jesus and the resurrection, took occasion to imprint on those magistrates a future state. Atterbury.

3. Open space before a house. [perhaps, in this sense, from the Sax. ȝyrd, a yard, ȝ being changed into c. Or from the Lat. cors, cortis.]

You must have, before you come to the front, three courts: a green court plain, with a wall about it; a second court of the same, but more garnished, with little turrets, or other embellishments upon the wall; and a third court, to square with the front, not to be built but inclosed with a naked wall. Bacon.

Suppose it were the king's bedchamber, yet the meanest man in the tragedy must come and dispatch his business, rather than in the lobby or court yard (which is fitter for him), for fear the stage should be cleared, and the scenes broken. Dryden.

4. A small opening inclosed with houses and paved with broad stones, distinguished from a street.

5. Persons who compose the retinue of a prince.

The court's a school indeed, in which some few learn virtuous principles.

Beaumont and Fl. Custom of the Country.

Their wisdom was so highly esteemed, that some of them were always employed to follow the courts of their kings, to advise them. Temple.

6. Persons who are assembled for the administration of justice.

He was so zealous for his client, and so favourably received by the court, that he went on with great fluency to inform the bench, &c. Tatler, No. 186.

7. Any jurisdiction, military, civil, or ecclesiastical.

If any noise or soldier you perceive
Near to the wall, by some apparent sign
Let us have knowledge at the court of guard.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

The archbishop

Of Canterbury, accompanied with other

Learned and reverend fathers of his order,

Held a late court at Dunstable.

Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

I have at last met with the proceedings of the court baron, held in that behalf. Spectator.

8. The art of pleasing; the art of insinuation; civility; flattery.

Him the prince with gentle court did board. Spenser.

Hast thou been never base? Did love ne'er bend

Thy frailer virtue, to betray thy friend?

Flatter me, make thy court, and say it did;

Kings in a crowd would have their vices hid.

Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Some sort of people, placing a great part of their happiness in strong drink, are always forward to make court to my young master, by offering that which they love best themselves.

Locke.

I have been considering why poets have such ill success in making their court, since they are allowed to be the greatest and best of all flatterers: the defect is, that they flatter only in print or in writing. Swift to Gay.

9. It is often used in composition in most of its senses.

*Court of Guard. See the 7th sense of COURT.

1. The guard-room of soldiers; the place where the guard musters. See CORPS-DE-GARD.

The lieutenant to-night watches on the court of guard.

Shakspeare, Othello.

Visit your courts of guard, view your munition.

Beaumont and Fl. Beggar's Bush.

2. They who compose the guard.

Environed round with a court of guard about her, that stand in readiness with javelins in hand.

Parthenia Sacra, (1633,) p. 18.

TO COURT. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To woo; to solicit a woman to marriage.

Follow a shadow, it flies you;

Seem to fly it, it will pursue:

So court a mistress, she denies you;

Let her alone, she will court you.

B. Jonson, Forest.

Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,

The neighb'ring princes court her nuptial bed. Dryden, Æn.

Alas! Sempronius, wouldst thou talk of love

To Marcia, whilst her father's life's in danger?

Thou might'st as well court the pale trembling vestal,

While she beholds the holy flame expiring. Addison, Cato.

Even now, when silent scorn is all they gain,

A thousand court you, though they court in vain.

Pope.

2. To solicit; to seek.

Their own ease and satisfaction would quickly teach children to court commendation, and avoid doing what they found condemned, Locke on Education.

3. To flatter; to endeavour to please.

*COURT-BARON. See COURT. A court incident to every manor in the kingdom, and holden by the steward within the said manor. Blackstone.

COURT-BREEDING. n. s. [from court and breed.]* Education at court.

Court-breeding, and his perpetual conversation with flatterers, was but a bad school. Milton, Eiconoclastes.

COURT-BUBBLE. n. s. [from court and bubble.]* The trifle of a court; a thing of no moment.

You are no men, but masquers;
Shapes, shadows, and the masks of men; court-bubbles,
That every breath or breaks, or blows away.

Beaum. and Fl. Elder Brother.

COURT-CARD.* See COAT-CARD.

COURT-CHAPLAIN. n. s. [court and chaplain.] One who attends the king to celebrate the holy offices.

The maids of honour have been fully convinced by a famous court-chaplain.

Swift.

COURT-CUPBOARD.* The side-board, if it may so be called, of ancient days. It was a recess, fitted with shelves, on which plate was displayed; and was a moveable piece of furniture.

Away with the joint-stools, remove the court-cupboard, look to the plate.

Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

COURT-DAY. n. s. [court and day.] Day on which justice is solemnly administered.

The judge took time to deliberate, and the next court-day he spoke.

Arbutnot and Pope.

COURT-DRESS.* n. s. [from court and dress.] The dress in which a person appears at court; full-dress.

COURT-DRESSER. n. s. [court and dresser.] One that dresses the court, or persons of rank; a flatterer.

There are many ways of fallacy; such arts of giving colours, appearances and resemblances, by this court-dresser, fancy.

Locke.

COURT-FASHION.* n. s. [from court and fashion.] What is observed at court.

Christianity being the court-fashion, none would be out of it.

Fuller, Holy War, p. 207.

COURT-FAVOUR. n. s. Favours or benefits bestowed by princes.

We part with the blessings of both worlds for pleasures, court-favours, and commissions; and at last, when we have sold ourselves to our lusts, we grow sick of our bargain.

L'Estrange.

COURT-HAND. n. s. [court and hand.] The hand or manner of writing used in records and judicial proceedings.

He can make obligations, and write court-hand.

Shakspeare.

COURT-LADY.* n. s. [court and lady.] A lady conversant or employed in court.

The court-ladies especially, that were faulty as the men.

Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. (1655,) p. 385.

The same study, long continued, is as intolerable to them, as the appearing long in the same clothes or fashion is to a court-lady.

Locke.

By their tricks and trinketting between party and party, and their intriguing it with courtiers and court-ladies, they had upon the matter set the whole together by the ears.

South, Sermon vi. 114.

COURT-LEET.* n. s. [from court and leet, leode or leud, Sax. The court of the lords or vassals of a lord, where they render their leode-geld, leud-gild or guild, suit, service, or homage.] A court of record, held once in the year, and not oftener, within a particular hundred, lordship, or manor, before the steward of the leet.

Blackstone.

COURT-MARTIAL.* See COURT. A court appointed to investigate, and to punish, military offences; and is distinguished, as occasion requires, by the titles of a general, a regimental, and a garrison Court Martial.

CO'URTEOUS.* adj. [courtois, French; kurteis, Goth.] Elegant of manners; polite; well-bred; full of acts of respect.

He hath deserved worthily of his country; and his ascent is not by such easy degrees, as those who have been supple and courteous to the people.

Shakspeare, Coriol.

They are one while courteous, civil, and obliging; but, within a small time after, are supercilious, sharp, troublesome, fierce, and exceptious.

South.

CO'URTEOUSLY. adv. [from courteous.] Respectfully; civilly; complaisantly.

He thought them to be gentlemen of much more worth than their habits betrayed, yet he let them courteously pass.

Wotton.

Whilst Christ was upon earth, he was not only easy of access, he did not only courteously receive all that addressed themselves to him, but also did not disdain himself to travel up and down the country.

Calamy, Sermons.

Alcinous, being prevailed upon by the glory of his name, entertained him courteously.

Broome.

CO'URTEOUSNESS. n. s. [from courteous.] Civility; complaisance.

CO'URTER.* n. s. [from court.] He who woos or solicits women.

A courter of wenches.

Sherwood.

CO'URTESAN.* n. s. [Fr. courtisane, Ital. cortigiana,

CO'URTEZAN. } n. s. [Fr. courtisane, Ital. cortigiana, low Lat. cortisana. Our old word is cortizan, or cortisan. Cotgrave, in translating courtisane, renders it "a lady, gentlewoman, or waiting-woman of the court; also, but less properly, a courtizan, professed strumpet, famous or infamous whore."] A woman of the town; a prostitute; a strumpet.

'Tis a brave night to cool a courtesan.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

With them there are no stews, no dissolute houses, no courtesans, nor any thing of that kind; nay, they wonder with detestation, at you in Europe, which permit such things.

Bacon, New Atlantis.

The Corinthian is a column, lasciviously decked like a courtesan.

Wotton.

Charixus, the brother of Sappho, in love with Rhodope the courtesan, spent his whole estate upon her.

Addison.

COURTESY.* n. s. [courtoisie, Fr. cortesia, Ital. kurteisi, Goth.]

1. Elegance of manners; civility; complaisance.

Of court, it seems, men courtesy do call,

For that it there most useth to abound.

Spenser, F. Q. vi. i. 1.

Sir, you are very welcome to our house;

It must appear in other ways than words,

Therefore I sent this breathing courtesy.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Who have seen his estate, his hospitality, his courtesy to strangers.

Peucham.

He, who was compounded of all the elements of affability and courtesy towards all kind of people, brought himself to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the queen.

Clarendon.

Courtesy — is sooner found in lowly sheds

With smoky rafters, than in tap'stry halls,

And courts of princes, where it first was nam'd.

Milton, Com.

So gentle of condition was he known,

That through the court his courtesy was blown.

Dryden, Fob.

2. An act of civility or respect.

You spurn'd me such a day; another time

You call'd me dog; and for these courtesies,

I'll lend you thus much money.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Repose you there, while I to the hard house

Return, and force their scantied courtesies.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

When I was last at Exeter,

The mayor in courtesy shew'd me the castle.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Sound all the lofty instruments of war,

And by that musick let us all embrace;

For heav'n to earth some of us never shall

A second time do such a courtesy.

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Other states, assuredly, cannot be justly accused for not staying for the first blow; or for not accepting Polyphemus's courtesy, to be the last that shall be eaten up.

Bacon.

3. The reverence made by women.

Some country girl scarce to a courtly bred,
Would I much rather than Cornelia wed;
If, supercilious, haughty, proud and vain,
She brought her father's triumphs in her train. Dryden, Jun.
The poor creature was as full of courtesies as if I had been her godmother: the truth on't is, I endeavour'd to make her look something Christian-like. Congreve, Old Bachelor.

4. A tenure, not of right, but by the favour of others;
as, to hold upon courtesy.
5. Co'URTESY of England. A tenure by which, if a man marry an inheritance, that is, a woman seised of land, and getteth a child of her that comes alive into the world, though both the child and his wife die forthwith; yet, if she were in possession, shall he keep the land during his life, and is called tenant per legem Angliæ, or by the courtesy of England.

To Co'URTESY.† v. n. [old Fr. courtiser.]

1. To perform an act of reverence: it is now only used of women.

Toby approaches; courtsies there to me.
Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

The petty traffickers,
That court'sy to them, do them reverence. Shakspeare.

2. To make a reverence in the manner of ladies.

If I should meet her in my way,
We hardly court'sy to each other. Prior.

To Co'URTESY.* v. a. To treat with courtesy.

The prince politickly courtesied him with all favours.
Sir R. Williams, Act. of the L. Countries, (1618.) p. 5.

Co'URTIER. n. s. [from court.]

1. One that frequents or attends the courts of princes.

He hath been a courtier, he swears. —
If any man doubts that, let him put me to my purgation. I have trod a measure; I have flattered a lady; I have been politick with my friend, smooth with mine enemy; I have undone three taylors; I have had four quarrels, and like to have fought
one. Shakspeare, As you like it.

You are a flattering boy; now, I see you will be a courtier.
Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

You know I am no courtier, nor versed in state affairs.
Bacon.

The principal figure in a picture, is like a king among his courtiers, who ought to dim the lustre of his attendants.
Dryden.

2. One that courts or solicits the favour of another.

What
Made thee, all honour'd honest Roman Brutus,
With the arm'd rest, courtiers of beauteous freedom,
To drench the capitol? Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

There was not among all our princes a greater courtier of the people than Richard the III. not out of fear but wisdom.
Suckling.

Co'URTIERY.* n. s. [from courtier.] The manners of a courtier.

In this garb he savours
Little of the nicety,
In the sprucer courtiery. B. Jonson, Entertainments.

Co'URTINE. See CURTAIN.

Co'URTLIKE.† adj. [from court and like.] Elegant; polite:
“After the manner of the court; or after the sort of a courtier.” Hulnot.

Our English tongue is, I will not say as sacred as the Hebrew, or as learned as the Greek, but as fluent as the Latin, as courteous as the Spanish, as courtlike as the French, and as amorous as the Italian. Camden's Remains.

Fore me you are not modest,
Nor is this courtlike. Braun, and Fl. Double Marriage.

Instead of masks,
Musick, tilts, tourneys, and such courtlike shews;
The hollow murmur of the checkless winds
Shall groan again. Marston's Malcontent.

I have at my command
The smell of flowers and odorous drugs,
Of ointments sweet, and excellent perfumes,
And courtlike waters; which if once you smell,
You in your heart will wish, as I suppose,
That all your body were transform'd to nose.

Brewer's Com. of Lingua, iv. ;

Co'URTLINESS. n. s. [from courtly.] Elegance of manners; grace of mien; complaisance; civility.

The slightest part that you excel in is courtliness.

Ld. Digby to Sir Kenelm Digby.

Co'URTING. n. s. [from court.] A courtier; a retainer to a court.

Courtling, I rather thou should'st utterly Dispraise my work, than praise it frosty. B. Jonson.

Co'URTLY.† adj. [from court.] Relating or relating to the court; elegant; soft; flattering.

But with remembrance of your gracious name,
Wherewith that courtly garland most ye grace,
And deck the world. Spenser, Sonn. to Lady Carew.

Modesty should be embrac'd of courtly virgins, as the preserver of chastity.

A. Widdel, on the Marriage of the Count Palatine with James the 1st's Daughter, 1612, p. 43.

Besides all the courtly preambles, necessary concomitants, and delightful consequences of marriage.

Morre, Conj. Cabb. (1653) p. 211.

In our own time, (excuse some courtly strains)
No whiter page than Addison's remains. Pope.

Co'URTLY. adv. In the manner of courts; elegantly.

They can produce nothing so courtly writ, or which expresses so much the conversation of a gentleman, as Sir John Suckling. Dryden on Dram. Poetry.

Co'URTSHIP.† n. s. [from court.]

1. The act of soliciting favour.

You'll judge me a novice in the affairs of the world, in not pitching upon some other patron; and unacquainted with the courtship of the times, that holds it more commendable to toy and complement with a stranger, than speak truth of a known friend. Morre, Song of the Soul, (1647.) Dedice.

He paid his courtship with the crowd,
As far as modest pride allow'd. Smyt

2. The solicitation of a woman to marriage.

Be merry, and employ your chiefest thoughts
To courtship, and such fair ostents of love,
As shall conveniently become you there.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

In tedious courtship we declare our pain,
And ere we kindness find, first meet disdain.

Dryden, Ind. Emp.

Every man in the time of courtship, and in the first entrance of marriage, puts on a behaviour like my correspondent's holiday suit. Addison, Guardian.

3. Civility; elegance of manners.

My courtship to an university,
My modesty I give to soldiers bare;
My patience to a gamester's share. Donne.

Co'USIN.† n. s. [cousin, Fr. consanguineus, Lat.

Our language has a feminine formation of this word, which has escaped Dr. Johnson, and is, I believe, in no dictionary. But the learned Lightfoot has employed it, who will, however, hardly be imitated: “My brethren and sisters, my cosens and cosenesses,” Miscell. p. 135.

1. Any one collaterally related more remotely than a brother or sister; a kinsman. Our ancestors considered cousin merely as importing one of the same blood; and so applied it to nephews, grandchildren, &c.

Macbeth unseam'd him.

— Oh, valiant cousin! worthy gentleman. Shakspeare.

Tybalt, my cousin! O, my brother's child!

Unhappy sight! alas, the blood is spill'd,
Of my dear kinsman. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

COW

Thou art, great lord, my father's sister's son,
And cousin german to good Priam's seed.

Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

A title given by the king to a nobleman, particularly to those of the council.

Then let me hear.

Of you, my gentle cousin, Westmorland.

What yesternight our counsel did decree, &c. Shakspeare.

COUSIN.* adj. [from the substantive. A very ancient employment of the word.] Allied; kindred.

Eke Plato sayeth, whoso can him rede,

The world's, most ben cousin to the dede.

Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

Her former sorrow into sudden wrath

(Both cousen passions of distressed spright)

Converting, forth she beates the dusty path.

Spenser, F. Q. iii. iv. 12.

COUTEAU.* n. s. [Fr. a knife.] A hanger; as the word is sometimes used.

COUTIL.* adj. [Sax. cuð.] Known. See UNFOUTH.

Bullockar.

COUTIL.* In our old authors, used for coud. See Coud.

Couth cometh of the verb cune, that is, to know, or to have skill; as well interpreteth the same Su. T. Smith, in his booke of government. E. A. on Spenser's Shep. Cal. Jan.

COW.* n. s. [In the plural, anciently kine or ken, now commonly cows, cu. Sax. koe, Dutch. So far Dr. Johnson. As to the plural kine, or ken, it is in fact nothing more than a corruption of coven, the old plural of cow. The Goth. and Iceland. ku must be also added to the etymology. The Persian gaw is the same word. See Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 317.] The female of the bull; the horned animal with cloven feet, kept for her milk and calves.

We see that the horns of oxen and cows, for the most part, are larger than the bulls; which is caused by abundance of moisture, which in the horns of the bull filleth. Bacon.

After the fever is diminished, asses and goats milk may be necessary; yea, a diet of cows milk alone. Wiseand's Surg.

They, leaving in the fields his grazing cows,

He sought himself some hospitable house.

Good Creton entertain'd his godlike guest. Dryden, Fab.

Cow.* n. s. The moving top of the chimney of a hop-oast, or kiln. Kent. Supposed to be a corruption of cowl, being in the shape of the cowl or hood worn by some religious orders. Pegge.

To Cow.* v. a. [from coward by contraction, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Horne Tooke considers it as implying "to make to cower." Neither of these quaint etymologies will stand against the northern origin of this word, Su. kufca, to suppress, to keep under. V. Widegren, Su. Lex. The Iceland. kuga is the same.] To depress with fear; to oppress with habitual timidity.

Macduff was from his mother's womb

Untimely ripp'd.—

—Accursed be that tongue that tells me so;

For it hath cow'd my better part of man. Shakspeare, Macb.

I would die with you, but first I would so torture ye,

And cow you in your end, and so despise you,

For a weak and wretched coward.

Beaumont and Fl. Wife for a Month.

By reason of their frequent revolts they have drawn upon themselves the pressures of war so often, that it seems to have somewhat cowed their spirits. Howel, Vocal Forest.

For when men by their wives are cow'd,

Their horns, of course, are understood.

Indubras.

COW-HERD.* n. s. [Sax. cu-hepde; Teut. koe-herde.]

One whose occupation is to tend cows.

COW

COW-HOUSE. n. s. [cow and house.] The house in which kine are kept.

You must house your milch cows, that you give hay to, in your cow-house all night. Mortimer.

COW-ITCH.* See COUGHAGE.

COW-LEECH.* n. s. [cow and leech.] One who professes to cure distempered coys.

To COW-LEECH. v. n. To profess to cure cows.

Though there are many pretenders to the art of farriering and cow-leeching, yet many of them are very ignorant, especially in the country. Mortimer, Husbandry.

COW-WEED. n. s. [cow and weed.] A species of chervil.

COW-WHEAT. n. s. [from cow and wheat.] A plant.

COWARD.* n. s. [coward Fr. of uncertain derivation, Dr. Johnson says; but nothing further. He might have stated, that both Junius and Skinner have considered cowherd, as its origin; and Twisden and Somner, culum vertere, to turn tail, or run away; to which latter opinion Mr. Tyrwhitt has readily subscribed, thinking that the old French culvert, formed from the Latin culum vertere, might easily be corrupted into coward or coward. The supposition of cowherd might probably arise from the circumstance of reproachful terms having been anciently borrowed from the state of persons in a low degree, as villain, knave, &c. The old spelling of our word is cowherd or cowheard. See the adjective COWARD. Others offer cowheart or cow-hearted, as the parent of this word of disgrace. But Mr. Horne Tooke asserts, that coward is the past participle of the verb To Cower; implying "one who has cower'd before an enemy." This assertion, I think, is not correct, and he might just as well have offered "one who had been cowed before an enemy."—There can be no doubt that our word is from the old French "coward, un lâche, un poltron." V. Lacombe and Roquefort; the latter of whom, under courdisse, i. e. cowardise, refers the origin to coie, Lat. caula, the tail. "parce que les animaux qui craignent portent la queue entre les jambes." The Italians have coddardo, from coda, i. e. cauda also, as their coward; part of Menage's explanation of which is "dalla coda che fra le gambe portano i cani pavrosi." It may be added that coward is one of our heraldick terms; as, "a lion coward," that is, with his tail hanging down between his legs.]

1. A poltron; a wretch whose predominant passion is fear.

Pericles did such wonders, beyond belief, as were able to lead Musidorus to courage, though he had been born a coward.

Sidney.

There was a soldier that vaunted before Julius Cæsar, of the hurts he had received in his face. Cæsar knowing him to be but a coward, told him, You were best take heed, next time you run away, how you look back.

Bacon.

Some are brave one day, and coward another; as great captains have often told me, from their own experience and observation.

Temple.

A coward does not always escape with disgrace, but sometimes also he loses his life.

South.

Tremble ye not, Oh friends! and cowards fly,
Doom'd by the stern Telemachus to die. Pope, Odyssey.

2. It is sometimes used in the manner of an adjective.

Having more man than wit about me, I drew;

And rais'd the house with loud and coward cries. Shakspeare.

Invading fears repel my coward joy,

And ill foreseen the present bliss destroy.

Prior.

CO'WARD.* adj. [from the substantive.] Like a coward; dastardly.

Who when he none of all those knights did see
Hastily bent that enterprise to leave,
Nor undertake the same for cowheard fear,
He stepped forth with courage bold and great.

Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 15.

'That craven cowherd knight.

Ib. vi. vi. 26.

To CO'WARD.* v. a. [old Fr. couarder.] To make timorous or cowardly.

What read you there,
That hath so cowarded and chas'd your blood
Out of appearance?

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CO'WARDICE.† n. s. [from the old Fr. coardise.] Fear; habitual timidity; pusillanimity; want of courage.

Certes, sir knight, ye been too much to blame,
Thus for to blot the honour of the dead;

And with foul cowardice his carcase shame,
Whose living hands immortaliz'd his name.
Gallant and fearless courage will turn into a native and heroic valour, and make them hate the cowardice of doing wrong.

Milton on Education.

None was disgraced; for falling is no shame,
And cowardice alone is loss of faufe:
The vent'rous knight is from the saddle thrown,
But 'tis the fault of fortune, not his own.

Dryden, Fab.

This great, this holy, this terrible being is present to all our affections; sees every treacherous inclination of our heart to desert his service; and treasures up, against the day of his wrath, the secret cowardice which detels us from asserting his cause, which prevails on us to compliment the vices of the great, to applaud the libertine, and laugh with the prophane.

Rogers, Sermon.

To CO'WARDIZE.* v. a. [from the noun: which indeed the excellent author whom I cite, as using this verb, writes cowardize.] To render timorous or cowardly.

Wickedness naturally tends to dishearten and cowardize men.

Scott, Sermon before the Artill. Comp. 1680.

CO'WARDLIKE.* adj. [from toward and like.] Resembling a coward; acting as a coward.

It would betray a poverty of spirit

In me to obstruct my fortunes, or descent,

If I should coward-like surrender up

The interest which the inheritance of your virtue,

And mine own thrifty fate, can claim in honour.

Braun, and Fl. Laws of Candy.

CO'WARDLINESS.† n. s. [from cowardly.] Timidity; cowardice.

I know not whether he more detests cowardliness or cruelty.

Bp. Hall, Char. The Valiant Man.

Hugh of France was already returned home, pretending the colick; though some impute it to cowardliness, and make the disease not in his bowels but his heart.

Faller, Holy War, p. 43.

CO'WARDLY. adj. [from coward.]

1. Fearful; timorous; pusillanimous.

An Egyptian soothsayer made Antonius believe that his genius, otherwise brave and confident, was in the presence of Octavius poor and cowardly.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Mean; befitting a coward; proceeding from fear.

I do find it cowardly and vile,

For fear of what might fall, so to prevent

The time of life.

Shakspeare, Jul. Cas.

Let all such as can enlarge their consciences like hell, and style a cowardly silence in Christ's cause discretion, know, that Christ will one day scorn them.

South.

CO'WARDLY.† adv. In the manner of a coward; meanly; vilely.

He sharply reprov'd them as men of no courage, who had most cowardly turned their backs upon their enemies.

This is the stupid state of drooping soul,

That loves his body, and false forms admires: —

But cowardly declines the noble strife

'Gainst vice and ignorance.

Merc, Song of the Soul, ii. i. 17.

CO'WARDIOUS.* adj. [from coward.] This is our old word for cowardly, and is found in Barret's Alvearie; formed like hazardous, and jeopardous.
Cowardly. Not now in use.

CO'WARDSHIP. n. s. [from coward.] The character or qualities of a coward; meanness; a word not now in use.

A very paitry boy, and more a coward than a hare: his dishonesty appears in leaving his friend here in necessity, and denying him; and for his cowardship, ask Fabian.

Shakspeare.

To CO'WER.† v. n. [cawrian, Welsh; courber, Fr. or perhaps borrowed from the manner in which a cow sinks on her knees, Dr. Johnson says. But it may be rather from the manner in which a bird descends into its nest, or sits in it, or stoops over its prey. The Su. Goth. kure, is translated, "avium mort reclinatus quiesco." V. Seren. and G. Andr. Our word is often written cour or coure. In the north of England it is still used for to crouch down, or squat upon one's hams.] To sink by bending the knees; to stoop; to shrink.

Let the pail be put over the man's head above water, then he cower down, and the pail be pressed down with him.

Bacon

The splitting rocks cower'd in the sinking sands,

And would not dash me with their ragged sides.

Shakspeare.

Do you know the French knight that cowers in the hairs?

Shakspeare, Pericle.

The metaphor of a wing [applied to an army] leaves most this way, whether we consider their figure and motion being stretched out, or their posture when birds of rapine sit couring over their prey.

Middlem Dan. p. 41.

As thus he spake, each bird and beast behold

Approaching two and two; these cowering low

With blandishment; each bird stoop'd on his wing.

Milton, P. L.

Our dame sits cowering o'er a kitchen fire;

I draw from air, and nature's works admire.

Dryden.

To CO'WER. v. a. [old Fr. couver, "to cower over, to cherish, to protect; also, to hatch." Cotgrave. See also Menage in V. CO'VEN. We thus use the active verb To BROOD.] To cherish by care.

Where finding life not yet dislodged quite,

He much rejoic'd, and cour'd it tenderly,

As chicken newly hatcht, from dreaded destiny.

Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 9.

CO'WISH.† adj. [from To cow, to awe.]

1. Timorous; fearful; mean; pusillanimous; cowardly. Not in use.

It is the cowish terror of his spirit,

That dares not undertake: he'll not feel wrong,

Which tie him to an answer.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. Pertaining to a cow. Obsolete.

Hudnot.

CO'WKEEPER. n. s. [cow and keeper.] One whose business is to keep cows.

The terms cowkeeper and hogherd, are not to be used in our poetry; but there are no finer words in the Greek language.

Broom.

COWL.† n. s. [old Fr. coule; cugle, Sax. cucullus, Lat.]

1. A monk's hood.

You may imagine that Francis Cornfield did scratch his elbow, when he had sweetly invented, to signify his name, saint Francis with his friary cowl in a cornfield.

Camden.

What differ more, you cry, than crown and cowl?

I'll tell you, friend, a wise man and a fool.

Pope.

2. [Perhaps from cool, cooler, a vessel in which hot liquor is set to cool, Dr. Johnson says. Perhaps our word is allied to the Germ. kugel, a bowl or round substance; Iceland. koggul. In Essex a cowl

I have seen a horse carrying home the harvest on a crate.

Johnson, Journey to the Western Isles.

CRAVAT. n. s. [of uncertain etymology, Dr. Johnson says, Fr. cravate, which Menage derives from the Eroats, a sort of German troops, usually called Cravates; from whom, in 1636, this ornament, he adds, was adopted in France. — Serenius refers at once to the part which the cravat adorns, and so deduces it from the West Goth. krafice for kraige, the neck. Appendix, Eng. and Sw. Dict. Pope places the accent on the first syllable.] A neck-cloth; any thing worn about the neck.

Less delinquents have been scourg'd,
And hemp on wooden anvils forg'd;
Which others for cravats have worn
About their necks, and took a turn.

Hudibras.

With eager beats his Mechlin cravat moves.

Pope, Bass-T-Table.

The restrictives were applied, one over another, to her throat: then we put her on a cravat.

Wiseman, Surgery.

TO CRAVE. v. a. [crāvan, Saxa.]

1. To ask with earnestness; to ask with submission; to beg; to entreat.

What one petition is there found in the whole litany, whereof we shall ever be able at any time to say, that no man living needeth the grace or benefit therein craved at God's hands?

Hooker.

As for my nobler friends, I crave their pardons;

But for the mutable rank-scented many,

Let them regard me as I do not flatter.

Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

The poor people not knowing where to hide themselves from the fury of their enemies, nor of whom to crave help, fled as men and women dismayed.

Knolles.

I would crave leave here, under the word action, to comprehend the forbearance too of any action proposed.

Locke.

Each ardent nymph the rising current craves,

Each shepherd's pray'r retards the parting waves.

Prior.

2. To ask insatiably.

The subject arm'd; the more their princes gave,
Th' advantage only took the more to crave.

Denham.

Hum dost thou mean, who, spite of all his store,

Is ever craving, and will still be poor?

Who cheats for halfpence; and who doffs his coat,

To save a farthing in a ferry-boat.

Dryden, Pers.

3. To long; to wish unreasonably. See CRAVING.

4. To call for importunately.

Bestow

Your needful counsel to our businesses,

Which crave the instant use.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The antecedent concomitants and effects of such a constitution, are acids, taken in too great quantities; sour eruptions, and a craving appetite, especially of terrestrial and absorbent substances.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

5. Sometimes with for before the thing sought.

Once one may crave for love,

But more would prove

This heart too little, that too great.

Shakling.

CRAVEN. n. s. [derived by Skinner from crave, as one that craves or begs his life; perhaps it comes originally from the noise made by a conquered cock, Dr. Johnson says. "Craven," says Mr. Horne Tooke, "is one who has craved or craven his life from his antagonist; dextramque precantem protendens." Div. of Purley, ii. 71. Another learned etymologist has also said, "our word craven, a coward, is nothing but the humble and submissive craver." Whiter, Etym. Magn. p. 148. Thus fortified is the etymology of craven; but it is not impregnable. The word craven, cravent, or cravant, was the ancient exclamation, in a criminal trial by battle, of those who yielded to their opponents; which therefore was considered a term of the greatest infamy, and in time became the common appellation of all cowards. The law was, that the conquered should acknowledge his submission, before the people, in pronouncing this "word of fear," and Lord Coke says, that if the accuser joined battle, and cried craven, he was to lose "liberam legem;" if the accused, he was to be hanged. Now this expression cravent, or cravant, is, as Dr. Jamieson also has observed, undoubtedly from the old French cravant, "terme de jurisprudence feudale: c'est une promesse de rendre service." Dict. Trev. By the use of it, therefore, Dr. Jamieson adds, the vanquished person merely did homage to the victor as his superiour. Creante is the old Fr. substantive for consent, or promise; and cranter, or creanter, the verb. V. Lacombe, and Roquesfort. And Du Cange, in the low Lat. CREANTUM. The Scottish word for craven is craydown, which, if not a corruption of crant itself, may be, as Dr. Jamieson has remarked, from creant and donner, to give faith, or do homage. In the north of England, I may add, craddently is yet used for cowardly.]

VOL. I.

1. A cock conquered and dispirited.

What, is your crest a coxcomb? —

— A combless cock, so Kate will be my hen.

— No cock of mine; you crow too like a craven.

Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Oh craven-chicken of a cock o' the game!

Beaum. and Fl. Martial Mand.

2. A coward; a recreant; a weak-hearted, spiritless fellow.

Is it fit this soldier keep his oath?

— He is a craven and a villain else.

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Oh! here's one made to my hand,

Methinks looks like a craven;

Less pains will serve his trial; some slight juggle.

Beaum. and Fl. Passion. Madman.

CRA'VEN. adj. Cowardly; base.

Upon his coward breast

A bloody cross, and on his craven crest

A bunch of hairs discolour'd diversly.

Spenser, F. Q.

Whether it be

Beetial oblivion, or some craven scruple

Of thinking too precisely on the event; —

A thought, which, quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom,

And, ever, three parts coward.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Yet if the innocent some mercy find

From cowardice, not ruth did that proceed;

His noble foes durst not his craven kind

Exasperate by such a bloody deed.

Fairfax.

TO CRA'VEN. v. a. [from the noun.] To make recreant or cowardly.

Hammer.

Against self-slaughter

There is a prohibition so diving,

That cravens my weak hand.

Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Dejected souls, cravened with their own distrust, are the world's footballs, to be kicked and spurned.

Quarles, Judg. and Mercy. The Proud Man.

CRA'VER. n. s. [from crave.] An insatiable ask-

It is used in Clarissa, Dr. Johnson says; and, I may add, it is one of our old substantives, being in Huloet's Dictionary, and there rendered mendicinus.

It is also in Sherwood, a century after Huloet, and a century before Richardson.

CRA'VING. n. s. [from crave.] Unreasonable desire.

Levity pushes us on from one vain desire to another, in a regular vicissitude and succession of cravings and satiety.

L'Estrange.

He is actually under the power of a temptation, and the sway of an impetuous lust; both hurrying him to satisfy the cravings of it, by some wicked action.

South.

To GRAUNCH. † v. a. [schrantsen, Dutch; whence the vulgar say more properly to scraunch.] To clush in the mouth. See To CRANCH.

She would craunch the wing of a lark, bones and all, between her teeth. Swift, Voy. to Brobdingnag, ch. 3.

CRAW. † n. s. [kroc, Danish.]

1. The crop or first stomach of birds.

In birds there is no mastication, or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallowed into the crop or crawl, or at least into a kind of anti-stomach, which I have observed in many, especially piscivorous birds. Ray on the Creation.

2. The human stomach, in contempt.

That this holy prophet, the Baptist, should be great in the sight of God; and should not give himselfe with the wicked priests of the earth, or the false prophets of Israel, to gorge their craws with bibbing cheer, but should lead an austere and temperate diet. Anderson, Expos. on Benedictus, (1573,) fol. 43.

CRAWFISH. n. s. [sometimes written crayfish, properly crevis; in French crevisse.] A small crustaceous fish found in brooks; the small lobster of fresh water.

Those that cast their shell are the lobster, the crab, the crayfish, the hoddmandor or dodman, and the tortoise. Bacon.
Let me to crack live crayfish recommend. Pope.

The common crayfish, and the large sea crayfish, both produce the stones called crabs eyes. Hill.

To CRAWL. v. n. [krieken, Dutch.]

1. To creep; to move with a slow motion; to move without rising from the ground, as a worm.

I saw them under a green mantling vine,
That crawls along the side of you small hill. Milton, Com.

That crawling insect, who from mud began;
Warm'd by my beams, and kindled into man! Dryden.

The streams but just contain'd within their bounds,
By slow degrees into their channels crawl;
And earth increases as the waters fall. Dryden.

A worm finds what it searches after, only by feeling, as it crawls from one thing to another. Grew, Cosmol.

The vile worm, that yesterday began
To crawl; thy fellow-creature, abject man! Prior.

2. To move weakly, and slowly, or timorously.

'Tis our first intent
To shake all cares and business from our age,
While we unburthen'd crawl tow'rd death. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

They like tall fellows crept out of the holes; and secretly crawling up the battered walls of the fort, got into it. Knolles.

For the fleets of Solomon and the kings of Egypt, it is very apparent they went with great leisure, and crawled close by the shore side. Heylin.

A look so pale no quartane ever gave;
Thy dwindled legs seem crawling to a grave. Dryden, Jyn.

He was hardly able to crawl about the room, far less to look after a troublesome business. Arbutnot, J. Bull.

Man is a very worm by birth,
Vile reptile, weak and vain!

A while he crawls upon the earth,
Then shrinks to earth again. Pope.

It will be very necessary for the threadbare gownman, and every child who can crawl, to watch the fields at harvest-time. Swift.

3. To advance slowly and sllily.

Hath crawl'd into the favour of the king,
And is his oracle. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

4. To move about hated and despised.

Reflect upon that litter of absurd opinions that crawl about the world, to the disgrace of reason. South.

How will the condemned sinner then crawl forth, and appear in his filth, before that undefiled tribunal? South.

Behold a rev'rend sire, whom want of grace
Has made the father of a nameless race
Crawl through the street, shov'd on, or rudely press'd
By his own sons, that pass him by unbles'd! Pope.

CRAWL. * n. s. [Span, corral, a vault, or cellar.] The well in a boat.

CRAWLER. † n. s. [from crawl.] A creeper; any thing that creeps.

Unarm'd of wings and scaly oare,
Unhappy crawler on the land. Lovelace, Luc. p. 140.

CRAY, CRAYER, OR CRÈRE. * n. s. [old Fr. crayer, "sorte de vaisseau de guerre," Lacombe; low Lat. crayera; Sw. krejare, "a small vessel with one mast," Widegren.] A small sea-vessel.

O, melancholy!

Who ever yet could sound thy bottom? find
The ooze, to show what coast thy sluggish crare
Might easiest harbour in? Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

To ships, and barks, with gallies, bulks, and crayes.
Harington, Orl. Fur. xxxix. 28.

Let him venture

In some decay'd crare of his own. Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

The owner of every ship, vessel, or crayer.

Stat. 2 Jac. I. ch. 32.

CRA'VEISH. n. s. [See CRAWFISH.] The river lobster.

The cure of the mercurial and armoniack saltiness requires slimy meats; as snails, tortoises, jellies, and crayfishes. Floyer.

CRA'YON. n. s. [crayon, French.]

1. A kind of pencil; a roll of paste to draw lines with.

Let no day pass over you without drawing a line: that is to say, without working, without giving some strokes of the pencil or the crayon. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. A drawing or design done with a pencil or crayon.

To CRAZE. v. a. [ecraser, French, to break to pieces.]

1. To break; to crush; to weaken.

In this consideration the answer of Calvin unto Farrel, concerning the children of Popish parents, doth seem crazed. Hooker.

Relent, sweet Hernia; and, Lysander, yield
Thy crazed title to my certain right. Shakspeare.

'Till length of years
And sedentary numbness craze my limbs. Milton, P. L.

Then through the fiery pillar, and the cloud,
God looking forth, will trouble all his host,
And craze their chariot-wheels. Milton, P. I.

2. To powder.

The tin ore passeth to the crazing mill, which, between two grinding stones, bruiseeth it to a fine sand. Carew's Survey.

3. To crack the brain; to impair the intellect.

I lov'd him, friend,
No father his son dearer, true, to tell thee,
That grief hath craz'd my wits. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Wickedness is a kind of voluntary frenzy, and a chosen distraction; and every sinner does wilder and more extravagant things than any man can do that is crazed and out of his wits, only with this sad difference, that he knows better what he does. Tillotson.

CRA'ZEDNESS. † n. s. [from crazed.] Decrepitude; brokenness; diminution of intellect.

The nature, as of men that have sick bodies, so likewise of the people in the crazedness of their minds, possessed with dislike and discontentment at things present, is to imagine that any thing would help them. Hooker.

Four several persons were scarcely able to hold him; and this at first without any distemper in his head, or crazedness in his brain. Hallywell, Melampr. p. 78.

CRA'ZINESS. † n. s. [from crazy.]

1. State of being crazy; imbecility; weakness.

Tonching other places, she may be said to hold them as one should do a wolf by the ears; nor will I speak now of the craziness of her title to many of them. Howell, Vocal Forest.

There is no craziness we feel, that is not a record of God's having been offended by our nature; and every little ache about us is a thorn or briar springing out of that offensive earth, whereof we are composed.

W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. P. ii. (1654,) p. 196

2. Weakness of intellect.

CRAZY. adj. [cracé, Fr.]

1. Broken ; decrepit.

• Come, my lord,
We will bestow you in some better place ;
Fitter for sickness and for crazy age. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.
• When people are crazy and in disorder, it is natural for them to groan. I. E. Strange.

2. Broken witted ; shattered in the intellect.

I have heard for certain of a minister of no small print and repute among the people, who took great offence at the great sleeves of a lady's new-fashioned gown, calling them anti-christian, ungodly, strange apparel, and such as the Lord was displeased with ; yet within one year this good man's wife was in the same fashion, without any scandal to her supercilious husband ; so crazy are some men's judgements, and so easy their censures, as to matters of scandal !
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hande. p. 144.

The queen of night, whose large command
Rules all the sea and half the land,
And over moist and crazy brains,
In high spring-tides, at midnight reigns. Hudibras.

3. Weak ; feeble ; shattered ; ailing ; out of order ; as it is still used in some places.

Ant. How is't, signior ?
Mer. Crazy a little.
Mar. What ail you, sir ? Beaumont and Fl. The Coxcomb.
Physick can but mend our crazy state,
Patch an old building, not a new create. Dryden.
Were it possible that the near approaches of eternity, whether by a mature age, a crazy constitution, or a violent sickness, should amaze so many, had they truly considered. Wake.

CREAGHT. n. s. [an Irish word.]

In these fast places, they kept their creaghts, or herds of cattle, living by the milk of the cow, without husbandry or tillage. Davies on Ireland.

To CREAGHT. v. n.

It was made penal to the English to permit the Irish to creaght or graze upon their lands, or present them to ecclesiastical benefices. Davies on Ireland.

To CREAK. v. n. [corrupted from crack, Dr. Johnson says. But it is from the old Fr. verb, criquer.]1. To make a harsh protracted noise ; " to creak as a shoe." Sherwood.

No door there was th' unguarded house to keep,
On creaking hinges turn'd, to break his sleep. Dryden.

2. It is sometimes used of animals ; as, to creak or cry like a gander, Barret ; to creak like a crane, Sherwood. [Welsh, crech, a scream.]

The creaking locusts with my voice conspire,
They fry'd with heat, and I with fierce desire. Dryden.

CREAKING. n. s. [from the verb.] • A harsh noise.

Let not the creaking of shoes, nor the rustling of silks, betray thy poor heart to women. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Their black and neat slipper, or stertup, with the creaking, allureth young men.

A. Willet on the Marriage of the C. Palatine, &c. 1612, p. 47.
With what patience doth this man bear the loud scoldings of his Xantippe, making no more of them than the creaking of a cart-wheel !
Bp. Hall, of Contentation, § 16.

CREAM. n. s. [Goth. kreima, Lat. cremor.]

1. The unctuous or oily part of milk, which, when it is cold, floats on the top, and is changed by the agitation of the churn into butter : the flower of milk.

It is not your inky brows, your black silk hair,
Your huge eye-balls, nor your cheek of cream,
That can entame my spirits to your worship. Shakspeare.
I am as vigilant as a cat to steal cream. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Cream is matured and made to rise speedily, by putting in cold water ; which, as it seemeth, getteth down the whey. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

How the drudging goblin swet,
To earn his cream bowl duly set ;
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail had thresh'd the corn. Milton, L. All.

Let four various creams encircled be
With swelling fruit, just gavis'd from the tree. King.

Milk standing some time, naturally separates into an oily liquor called cream, and a thinner, blue, and more ponderous liquor called skimmed milk. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. It is used for the best part of any thing ; as, the cream of a jest.

This is the fourth degree of love, and the cream and top of love, whilst we are on this side heaven.

Hewyl's Serm. (1658,) p. 94.

To CREAM. v. n. [from the noun.] To gather on the surface. This figurative expression from milk is, in the north of England, applied to beer, which is said to creamy, i. e. to froth or mantle.

There are a sort of men, whose visages
Do cream and mantle, like a standing pond ;
And do a wilful stiffness entertain,
With purpose to be drest in an opinion
Of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit.

Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

Not any wrinkle creaming in their faces.
Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois.

To CREAM. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To skim off the cream.

Have you some creamed or curded milk ?
Wodroffe, Fr. Gr. (1623,) p. 211.

2. To take the flower and quintessence of any thing.

Such a man, truly wise, creams off nature, leaving the sour, and the dregs, for philosophy and reason to lap up.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, sect. 9.

CREAM-FACED. adj. [cream and faced.] Pale ; coward-looking.

Thou cream-fac'd lown,
Where got'st thou that goose-look. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

CREAMY. adj. [from cream.] Full of cream ; having the nature of cream.

Your creamy words but cozen.
Beaumont and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

There each trim lass, that skims the milky store,
To the swart tribes their creamy bowls allots.

Collins, Popular Superstitions of the Highlands.

CREANCE. n. s. [French.] Is, in falconry, a fine small line, fastened to a hawk's leash when she is first lured.CREASE. n. s. [from creta, Latin, chalk, Skinner ; to which Dr. Johnson assents. In the old chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, creysede occurs in the sense of crossed ; whence Hearn conjectures our creased to be derived. See also Kelham in Exercises, old Fr. crossed. But I must not omit the 1. ut. kroesen, to curl or wreath.] A mark made by doubling any thing.

Men of great parts are unfortunate in business, because they go out of the common road : I once desired lord Bolingbroke to observe, that the clerks used an ivory knife, with a blunt edge, to divide paper, which cut it even, only requiring a strong hand ; whereas a sharp penknife would go out of the crease, and disfigure the paper. Swift.

To CREASE. v. a. [from the noun.] To mark any thing by doubling it, so as to leave the impression.To CREATE. v. a. [creo, Lat.]

A. To form out of nothing ; to cause to exist.

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. Genesis, i. 1.

We having but imperfect ideas of the operations of our minds, and much imperfecter yet of the operations of God, run into great difficulties about free created agents, which reason cannot well extricate itself out of. Locke.

2. To produce; to cause; to be the occasion of.

Now is the time of help: your eye in Scotland.
Would create soldiers, and make women fight. Shakspeare.
His abilities were prone to create in him great confidence of undertakings, and this was like enough to betray him to great errors and many enemies. K. Charles.

They eclipse the clearest truths, by difficulties of their own creating, or no man could miss his way to heaven for want of light. Decay of Piety.

None knew, till guilt created fear,
What darts or poison'd arrows were. Roscommon.

Must I new bars to my own joy create,
Refuse myself what I had forc'd from fate? Dryden, Aurengz.
Long abstinence is troublesome to acid constitutions, by the uneasiness it creates in the stomach. Arbutnot.

3. To beget.

4. To invest with any new character.

Arise my knights of the battle: I create you
Companions to our person, and will fit you
With dignities becoming your estates. Shakspeare, Cymb.

5. To give any new qualities: to put any thing in a new state.

The best British undertaker had but a proportion of three thousand acres for himself, with power to create a manor, and hold a court-baron. Davies on Ireland.

CREA'TE.* adj. [from the verb.]

1. Begotten.

And the issue there create
Ever shall be fortunate. Shakspeare.

Consider the immensity of the Divine Love, expressed in all the emanations of his providence; in his creation, in his conservation of us. Bp. Taylor.

2. The act of investing with new qualities or character: as, the creation of peers.

3. The things created; the universe.

As subjects then, the whole creation came;
And from their natures Adam them did name. Denham.

Such was the saint, who shone with ev'ry grace,
Reflecting, Moses like, his master's face:
God saw his image lively was express'd,
And his own work as his creation bless'd. Dryden, Fob.

Nor could the tender new creation bear
Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year. Dryden, Virg.

In days of yore, no matter where or when,
Before the low creation swarm'd with men. Parnel.

The whole creation preys upon itself: Every living creature is inhabited. Tatler, No. 229.

4. Any thing produced, or caused.

Art thou not, fatal vision, sensible
To feeling as to sight? Or art thou but
A dagger of the mind, a false creation,
Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain? Shakspeare, Macbeth.

CREA'TIVE.* adj. [from create.]

1. Having the power to create.

But come, ye generous minds, in whose wide thought,
Of all his works, creative beauty burns
With warmest beam. Thomson, Spring.

2. Exerting the act of creation.

To trace the outgoings of the ancient of days in the first instance, and of his creative power, is a research too great for mortal enquiry. South.

CREA'TOR.* n. s. [creator, Lat.] The Being that bestows existence.

Open, ye heavens, your living doors; let in
The great Creator, from his work return'd Magnificent; his six days work, a world. Milton, P. L.

When you lie down, close your eyes with a short prayer, commit yourself into the hands of your faithful Creator; and when you have done, trust him with yourself, as you must do when you are dying. Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

CREA'TRESS.* n. s. [from the Lat. creatrix.] She who makes, or creates, any thing.

Him long she so with shadows entertain'd,
As her creatresse had in charge to her ordain'd. Spenser, F. Q. iii. viii. 10.

CREA'TURE.* n. s. [creatura, low Lat.]

1. A being not self-existent, but created by the supreme power.

Were these persons idolaters for the worship they did not give to the Creator, or for the worship they did give to his creatures. Stillingfleet.

2. Any thing created.

God's first creature was light. Bacon, New Atlantis.
Imperfect the world, and all the creatures in it, must be acknowledged in many respects to be. Tillotson.

3. An animal, not human:

The queen pretended satisfaction of her knowledge only
In killing creatures vile, as cats and dogs. Shakspeare, Cymb.

4. A general term for man.

Yet crime in her could never creature find;
But for his love, and for her own self-sake,
She wander'd had from one to other Ind. Spenser, F. Q.
Most curs'd of all creatures under sky, Spenser, F. Q.
Lo Tantalus, I here torment'd lye.
Though he might burst his lungs to call for help,
No creature would assist or pity him. Roscommon.

CREDULOUS. adj. [credulus, Latin.] Apt to believe; unsuspecting; easily deceived.

A credulous father, and a brother noble,
Whose nature is so far from doing harm,
That he suspects none. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

Who now enjoys thee credulous all gold,
Who always vacant, always amiable,
Hopes thee, of flattery gales
Unmindful, hapless he,
T' whom thou nuy'd seem'st fair. Milton.

CREDULOUSLY.* adv. [from credulous.] In an unsuspecting manner.

If you shall observe a man pretend to believe plain impossibilities, and not only supinely and credulously swallow them, but, &c. Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conf. P. iii.

CREDULOUSNESS. n. s. [from credulous.] Aptness to believe; credulity.

CREED. n. s. [Sax. creba, from the Lat. credo, the first word of the Apostles' Creed. "As the first word Crede, I believe, giveth a denomination to the whole confession of faith, from thence commonly called the Creed; so is the same word to be imagined not to stand only where it is expressed, but to be carried through the whole body of the confession." Pearson on the Creed.]

1. A form of words in which the articles of faith are comprehended.

The larger and fuller view of this foundation is set down in the creeds of the church. Hammond on Fundamentals.

Whate'er you are,

That in this desert inaccessible,
Under the shade of melancholy boughs,
Lose and neglect the creeping hours of time. Shakespeare.

"Of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women. 2 Tim. iii. 6.

Thou makest darkness, and it is night wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. Psal. civ. 20.

Now and then a work or two has crept in to keep his first design in countenance. Atterbury.

6. To move timorously without soaring, or venturing into dangers.

Paradise Lost is admirable; but am I therefore bound to maintain, that there are no flats amongst his elevations, when it is evident he creeps along sometimes for above an hundred lines together? Dryden.

We here took a little boat, to creep along the sea-shore as far as Genoa. Addison on Italy.

7. To come unexpected; to steal forward unheard and unseen.

By those gifts of nature and fortune he creeps, nay he flies, into the favour of poor silly women. Sidney.

It seems, the marriage of his brother's wife has crept too near his conscience.

— No, his conscience

Has crept too near another lady. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Necessity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creep out of Shinar, or Babylonia.

None pretends to know from how remote corners of those frozen mountains, some of those fierce nations first crept out. Temple.

It is not to be expected that every one should guard his understanding from being imposed on, by the sophistry which creeps into most of the books of argument. Locke.

8. To behave with servility; to fawn; to bend.

They were us'd to bend,
To send their smiles before them to Achilles,
To come as humbly as they us'd to creep
To holy altars. Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

CRÉPER.† n. s. [Sax. cpeopepe.]

1. A plant that supports itself by means of some stronger body.

Plants that put forth their sap hastily, have bodies not proportionable to their length; therefore they are winders or creepers; as ivy, briony, and woodbine. Bacon.

2. An iron used to slide along the grate in kitchens.
3. A kind of patten or clog worn by women.
4. An insect.

Standing waters are most unwholesome, putrified, and full of mite pers; stony, muddy, unclean. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 69.

5. A small bird, hardly larger than a wren, called also the ox-eye; which climbs trees like the woodpecker.

6. In naval language, a sort of grapnel, used for recovering things that may be cast overboard.

CRÉPIPOLE. n. s. [creep and hole.]

1. A hole into which any animal may creep to escape danger.
2. A subterfuge; an excuse.

CRÉPINGLY.† adv. [from creeping.] Slowly; after the manner of a reptile.

The joy, which wrought into Pygmalion's mind, was even such as, by each degree of Zelmene's words, creepingly entered into Philoclea's. Sidney.

That the poem be not inflate or glingling with an empty noise of words, nor creepingly low and insipid.

How sily and creepingly did he address himself to our first parents. Phillips, Theatr. Poet. Pref. South, Sermon. viii. 92.

CRÉPLE.† n. s. [Dutch krepel, Sax. cpypel. This was the more usual way of writing what is now written cripple. Dr. Johnson has merely noticed it only in Donne. The old dictionaries of Huloet and Barret give creple; and what recent editions of the New Testament present as "a cripple," Acts xiv. 8. continued to be creple till about the close of the 17th century.] A lanie person, a cripple.

She to whom this world must itself refer
As suburbs or the microcosm of her,

She, she is dead, she's dead when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how lane a creple this world is. Donne.

Not lying like creeples on the bank, when we have a Bethesda before us. Hammond's Works, iv. 508.

CREMATION. n. s. [crematio, Latin.] A burning.

CREMONA. Fiddle.* [probably from Cremona in Italy.] A violin so called, and highly valued.

A lady whisking about her long train, which was then the fashion, threw down and broke a fine Cremona fiddle; upon which Swift cried out, Mantua vae miseræ nimium vicina Cremonæ!

Sheridan, Life of Swift.

CREMOR. n. s. [Latin.] A milky substance; a soft liquor resembling cream.

The fool is swallowed into the stomach, where, mingled with dissolvent juices, it is reduced into a chyle or cremo.

Ray.

CRÉMOSIN.* adj. See CRIMOSIN.

CRÉNATED. adj. [from crena, Latin.] Notched; indented.

The cells are prettily crenated, or notched quite round the edges; but not straited down to any depth. Woodward.

CRÉOLES.* n. s. ["children born in the West Indies from Spaniards are called creollos, which signifies one born in that country; which word was made by the negroes; for so also they call their own children born in those parts, and thereby distinguish them from those of Guiny." Hist. of Peru, p. 397.] Such as are descended from the Spaniards; natives of Spanish America.

It has been guessed by some writers, that in all Spanish America there are about three millions of Spaniards and Creoles of different colours. Guthrie, Spanish America.

Her marry'd elm, had crept along the ground.

Pope.

CRÉPUSCULE. n. s. [crepusculum, Lat.] Twilight.

Dict.

CRÉPUSCULINE.* adj. [Fr. crepusculin, from crepusculum, Lat.] Glimmering; crepuscular.

He has made apertures to take in more or less light, as the observer pleases, by opening and shutting like the eye, the better to fit glasses to crepusculine observations.

Sygal, Hist. of the R. S. p. 314.

CRÉPUSCULOUS. adj. [crepusculum, Latin.] Glimmering; in a state between light and darkness.

A close apprehension of the one, might perhaps afford a glimmering light and crepusculous glance of the other. Brown.

The beginnings of philosophy were in a crepusculous obscurity, and it is yet scarce past the dawn. Glanville, Sceptis.

CRÉSCENT. adj. [from cresco, Latin.] Increasing; growing; in a state of increase.

I have seen him in Britain: he was then of a crescent note. Shakspeare, Cymb.

With these in troop

Came Astoreth, whom the Phæcyicians call'd

Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.

Milton.

CRÉSCENT. n. s. [crescens, Lat.] The moon in her state of increase; any similitude of the moon increasing.

My power's a crescent, and my auguring hope

Says it will come to the full.

Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Or Bactrian Sophi, from the horns
Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond
The realm of Aladule, in his retreat. Milton, P. L.
Jove in dusky clouds involves the skies,
And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their eyes. Dryden.
And two fair crescents of translucent horn,
The brows of all their young increase adorn. Pope, Odyssey.
TO CRESCENT. † v. a. [from the adj.] To form into a crescent. The old heraldick adjective crescented,
i. e. having a crescent, has long been unsupported by any usage of the verb. The verb is of recent date.

A dark wood crescents more than half the lawn.

Seward's Letters, vi. 197.

CRESCIVE. adv. [from cresco, Latin.] Increasing; growing.

So the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness, which, no doubt,
Grew like the summer-grass, fastest by night,
Unseen, yet crescive in his faculty. Shakespeare, Hen. V.

CRESS. † n. s. [perhaps from cresco, it being a quick grower, nasturtium, Lat. But the word is also the Sax. ceppre, pl. ceppen.] An herb.

Its flower consists of four leaves, placed in form of a cross: the point arises from the centre of the flower-cup, and becomes a roundish smooth fruit, divided into two cells, and furnished with seeds generally smooth. Miller.

His court with nettles and with crests stor'd,
With soups unbought, and sallads, blest his board. Pope.

CRESSET. † n. s. [croisette, Fr. because beacons had crosses anciently on their tops.]

1. A great light set upon a beacon, light-house, or watch-tower. Hammer. They still raise armies in Scotland by carrying about the fire-cross.

At my nativity

The front of heaven was full of fiery shapes,
Of burning crests. Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

From the arched roof,

Pendant by subtle magic, many a row
Of starry lamps, and blazing crests, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
As from a sky. Milton, P. L. ii. 728.

2. Simply, a lamp, or torch.

The countie Palatine of Rhene was conveyed by crestet light, and torch light, to Sir T. Gresham's house. Hollinshead, Chron.
Vigilance — in her one hand a lamp or crestet; in her other a bell. B. Jonson, King's Entertainment.

CREST. † n. s. [cræsta, Sax. crista, Lat.]

1. The plume of feathers, or tuft of horse-hair, on the top of the ancient helmet; the helmet.

His valour, shewn upon our crests to-day,
Hath taught us how to cherish such high deeds,
Ev'n in the bosom of our adversaries. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

2. The comb of a cock; whence Milton calls him crested.

Others, on ground

Walk'd firm; the crested cock, whose clarion sounds
The silent hours. Milton, P. I.

3. The ornament of the helmet in heraldry.

Of what esteem crests were, in the time of king Edward the third's reign, may appear by his giving an eagle, which he himself had formerly born, for a crest to William Montacute, earl of Salisbury. Camden, Remains.

The horn;

It was a crest ere thou wast born:
Thy father's father wore it. Shakespeare, As you like it.

4. Any tuft or ornament on the head; as some which the poets assign to serpents.

Their crests divide,

And, tow'ring o'er his head, in triumph ride. Dryden, Virgil.

5. Pride; spirit; fire; courage; loftiness of mien.

When horses should endure the bloody spur,
They fall their crests. Shakespeare.

TO CREST. * v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To mark with long streaks, in allusion to the streaming hair of the crest.

Like as the shining skie in summer's night,
What time the days with scorching heat abound,
Is crested all with lines of fire light,
That it prodigious seems in common people's sight.

Spenser, F. Q. iv. i. 13.

2. To serve as a crest for, in allusion to a crest of heraldry.

His legs bestrid the ocean; his rear'd arm crested the world.
Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

CRESTED. † adj. [from crest; cristatus, Latin.]

1. Adorned with a plume or crest.

The bold Ascalonite,
Fled from his lion ramp; old warriors tuen'd
Their plated backs under his heel;
Or, groveling, soil'd their crested helmets in the dust.

Milton, S. A. 141.

At this, for new replies he did not stay;
But he'd his crested helin, and strode away. Dryden.

2. Wearing a comb.

The crested bird shall by experience know,
Jove need not him his master-piece below. Dryden.

CREST-FALLEN. adj. [crest and fall.] Dejected; sunk; dispirited; cowed; heartless; spiritless.

I warrant you, they would whip me with their fine wits, till I were as crest-fallen as a dried pear.

Shakespeare, Merry W. of Windsor.

They prolate their words in a whining kind of querulous tone, as if they were still complaining and crest-fallen. Howell.

CRESTLESS. adj. [from crest.] Not dignified with coat-armour; not of any eminent family.

His grandfather was Lionel duke of Clarence,
Third son to the third Edward king of England,
Sprung crestless yeomen from so deep a root.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

CRETACEOUS. adj. [creta, chalk, Lat.]

1. Having the qualities of chalk; chalky.

What gives the light, seems hard to say; whether it be the cretaceous salt, the nitrous salt, or some igneous particles.

Green.

2. Abounding with chalk.

Nor from the sable ground expect success,
Nor from cretaceous, stubborn and jejune. Philips.

CRETA'TED. adj. [cretatus, Lat.] Rubbed with chalk.
Dict.

CRE'TICK. * n. s. [κρητικὸς.] A foot used in Greek and Latin poetry, consisting of a short syllable between two long.

The first verse here ends with a trochee, and the third with a cretick. Bentley, Diss. upon Phalaris.

CRÉVICE. † n. s. [old Fr. crevis, “ruptures, crevasses,” Lacombe; from crever, Fr. crepare, Lat. to burst. Chaucer writes it crevasse.] A crack; a cleft;
a narrow opening.

I pried me though the crevice of a wall,
When for his hand he had his two sons heads

Titus Andronicus.

I thought it no breach of good manners to peep at a crevice, and look in at people so well employed. Spectator, No. 266.

TO CRÉVICE. v. a. [from the noun.] To crack; to flaw.

So laid they are more apt in swagging down to pierce with their points, than in the jacent posture, and so to crevice the wall. Wotton's Architecture.

CRÉVIS, or CRÉVISSE. * n. s. [Fr. ecrevisse.] Cray-fish; the word is yet used in our northern counties.

And there are abundance of more perfect creatures also, which depositing their old skins or shells, or some such emblem of their age, are at certain seasons brought back again to a youthful state, and such are snakes, lizards, crabs, crevices, eagles, king-fishers, and such like.

Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 265.

CREW. † n. s. [probably from crūd, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. He might have added cread, a crowd. But it is perhaps from the old Fr. creue, or creue, "growth, accession, augmentation, &c." Cotgrave.]

1. A company of people associated for any purpose; as, gallant crew, for troops. Cherry chase.

There a noble crew,

Of lords and ladies stood on every side.

Which with their presence fair, the place much beautify'd.

Spenser, F. Q.

2. The company of a ship.

The anchors drop'd, his crew the vessels moor. Dryden, Rhen.

3. It is now generally used in a bad sense.

One of the banish'd crew,

I fear, hath ventur'd from the deep, to raise

New troubles.

Milton, P. L.

He, with a crew, whom like ambition joins

With him, or under him to tyrannize,

Marching from Eden towards the West, shall find

The plain.

Milton, P. L.

The last was he, whose thunder slew

The Titan race, a rebel crew.

Addison.

CREW. † [the preterite of crow, Sax. creop. Mr. Pegge inclines to Bailey's opinion, that crew is the bastard preterite, and crowd the right heir; yet this preterite is warranted by the Saxon.]

Immediately the cock crew. St. Matt. xxvi. 74.

It was about to speak, when the cock crew. Shakspeare, Ham.

CREWEL. † n. s. [klewel, Dutch.] Yarn twisted and wound on a knot or ball.

A piece of arras is composed of several parcels, some wrought of silk, some of gold, silver, crewel of divers colours.

Burton, Angl. of Mel. p. 342.

Ere we contribute a new crewel garter

To his most worsted worship.

B. Jonson, Alchemist.

Take silk or crewel, gold or silver thread, and make these fast at the head of the hook.

Walton's Angler.

CRIB. † n. s. [crjbb, Sax. crib, German.]

1. The rack or manger of a stable.

Let a beast be lord of beasts, and his crib shall stand at the king's mess.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Look into all the cribs and troughs of brutish diet, and see whether you can find such a beast as a glutton.

Rp. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

The steer and lion at one crib shall meet,

And harmless serpents lick the pilgrim's feet.

Pope.

2. The stall or cabin of an ox.

Where no oxen are, the crib is clean.

P. ov. xiv. 4.

3. A small habitation; a cottage.

Why rather, sleep, liest thou in smoky cribs,

Upon uneasy pallets stretching thee,

Than in the perfum'd chambers of the great? Shakspeare.

TO CRIB. v. a. [from the noun.] To shut up in a narrow habitation; to confine; to cage.

Now I'm cabb'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in,

To saucy doubts and fears.

Shakspeare, Macbeth.

CRIBBAGE. † n. s. A game at cards.

For cards, the philologie of them is not for an essay. A man's fancy would be summed up in cribbage; gleeke requires a vigilant memory, &c. John Hall, Horæ Vac. (1646.) p. 150.

CRIBBLE. † n. s. [old Fr. crible, from cribrum, Lat. "De puiser Peau en un crible," French Prov. Wodroephe, Fr. and Eng. Gr. 1623, p. 486.]

1. A corn sieve.

Dict.

2. Coarse meal, a degree better than bran. [old Fr. criblure.]

CRIBBLE Bread. * Bread made of coarse meal. Holot.

The gardens, with digging for novelties, are turned over and over, because we will not eat common cribble bread.

Transl. of Bullinger's Sermons, p. 243.

TO CRIBBLE. * v. a. [from the noun.] To sift or cribble through a sieve.

Littellon, in V. Cerno.

CRIBRATION. n. s. [cribro, Lat.] The act of sifting or separating by a sieve.

CRICK. † n. s.

1. [from crizzo, Italian.] The noise of a door.

2. [from crjce, Saxon, a stake.] A painful stiffness in the neck.

When the weight of her years has almost brought both ends together; 'tis nothing, she'll tell ye, but a crick she has got in her back; and though she might recover her youth again, by confessing her age, she'll never acknowledge it.

D'Estrange, Tr. of Querebo's Visions.

3. A corruption of cricket; we say, "as merry as a cricket." "She'll talk sometimes; 'tis the maddest cricket!" Beaum. and Fl. This I take to be the origin of our phrase "as merry as a grig;" which Dr. Johnson and others derive from Græcus, a Greek! See CRICK. Crick is used for cricket in the old song of Take thy old Clock about thee.

A merry cricke, and boon companion.

Sheldon, Mir. of Antichrist, (1616,) p. 323.

CRICKET. n. s. [crichel, from crjken, to make a noise, Dutch.]

1. An insect that squeaks or chirps about ovens and fireplaces.

Did'st thou not hear a noise. —

I heard the owl scream, and the crickets cry. Shakspeare.

Far from all resort of mirth,

Save the cricket on the hearth.

Milton, Il. Pens.

The solemn death-watch tick'd the hour she died,

And shrilling cricket, in the chimney cry'd.

Gay.

2. [from crjce, Saxon, stick.] A sport, at which the contenders drive a ball with sticks or bats in opposition to each other.

The judge, to dance, his brother serjeant call,

The senator at cricket urge the ball.

Pope.

3. [from crjchen, Germ. to creep.] A low seat or stool.

CRICKETING Apple. n. s. A small species of apple.

CRIER. † n. s. [old Fr. crier.] The officer whose business is to cry or make proclamation.

He openeth his mouth like a crier.

Eccles. xx. 15.

The criers command silence, and the whole multitude present stand in a suspense.

Brevintwood on Languages.

The crier calls aloud

Our old nobility of Trojan blood,

Who gape among the crowd for their precarious food.

Dryden

CRIME. † n. s. [crimen, Lat. crime, French.]

1. An act contrary to right; an offence; a great fault; an act of wickedness.

High God be witness, that I guiltless am,

But if yourself, sir knight, ye guilty find,

Orswapped be in loves of former dame,

With crime do not it cover, but disclose the same.

Spenser, F. Q.

Undergo with me one guilt, one crime,

Of tasting.

Milton, P. L.

Like a punishment

As in their crime.

Milton, P. L.

No crime was thine, if 'tis no crime to love.

Pope.

2. Reproach. A Latinism.

The tree of life, the crime of our first father's fall.

Spenser, F. Q. i. xi. 46.

I rue

That error now, which is become my crime,

And thou the accuser.

Milton, P. L. ix. 1180.

CRIMEFUL. † adj. [from crime and full.] Wicked;

criminal; faulty in a high degree; contrary to duty; contrary to virtue.

You proceeded not against these feats,
So crimeful and so capital in nature. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Devise extremes beyond extremity,
To make him curse this cursed crimeful night.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

CRIMELESS. adj. [from crime.] Innocent; without crime.

My foes could not procure me any scathe,
So long as I am loyal, true, and crimeless. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

CRIMINAL. † adj. [old Fr. adj. criminel.]

1. Faulty; contrary to right; contrary to duty; contrary to law.

Live thou, and to thy mother dead attest,
That clear she died from blemish criminal. Spenser, F. Q.
What we approve in our friend, we can hardly be induced to think criminal in ourselves. Rogers.

2. Guilty; tainted with crime; not innocent.

The neglect of any of the relative duties, renders us criminal in the sight of God. Rogers.

3. Not civil: as, a criminal prosecution: the criminal law.

The discussion and adjudicement of crimes, and their punishment, forms in every country the code of criminal law.

Blackstone.

CRIMINAL. † n. s. [old Fr. criminel, n. s.]

1. A man accused.

Was ever criminal forbid to plead?
Curb your ill-manner'd zeal. Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. A man guilty of a crime.

All three persons, that had held chief place of authority in their countries; all three ruined, not by war, or by any other disaster, but by justice and sentence, as delinquents and crimi- nals. Bacon.

CRIMINALITY.  n. s.* [Fr. criminalité.] A criminal action, case, or cause.

Cotgrave.

If this perseverance in wrong, often appertains to individuals, it much more frequently appertains to public bodies; in them the disgrace of error, or even the criminality of conduct, belongs to so many, that no one is ashamed of the part which belongs to himself. Bp. Llandaff, (Watson.) Charge, (1805,) p. 28.

CRIMINALLY. adv. [from criminal.] Not innocently; wickedly; guiltily.

As our thoughts extend to all subjects, they may be crimi- nally employed on all. Rogers.

CRIMINALNESS. n. s. [from criminal.] Guiltiness; want of innocence.

To CRIMINATE.  v. a.* [Lat. crimino.] To accuse; to charge with crime.

And as for our church liturgy it is now criminated by many as idolatrous, because in some things it resembleth the mass, though not in the main.

Ld. North. Light in the Way to Paradise, (1682,) p. 29.

CRIMINATION. † n. s. [crimination, old Fr. crimination, Latin.] The act of accusing; accusation; arraignment; charge.

If this horrible crimination were cast upon thee, O Saviour, in whom the prince of this world found nothing, what wonder is it, if we thy sinful servants be branded on all sides with evil tongues. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 3.

The story of that calumnious crimination, devised by the Arian faction against Athanasius, as a charge of no small impiety. Meade, Diatr. p. 67.

The detractor, who accuses the saints with false criminations.
Bp. Patrick, Answer to the Touchstone, &c. p. 169.

Nor was there a single heathen, who confessed a deity, exempt from this crimination of holding the truth in unrighteousness. Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 275.

CRIMINATORY. † adj. [Fr. criminateur.] Relating to accusation; accusing; censorious.

CRIMINOUS. † adj. [criminosus, Lat. crimineus, Fr.] Wicked; iniquitous; enormously guilty.

They are led manacled after him as less criminous.

Bp. Hall, Contempl. The Crucifixion.

The punishment that belongs to that great and criminous guilt, is the forfeiture of his right and claim to all mercies, which are made over to him by Christ. Hammond

CRIMINOUSLY. adv. [from criminous.] Enormously; very wickedly.

Some particular duties of piety and charity, which were most crimiously omitted before. Hammond

CRIMINOUSNESS. n. s. [from criminous.] Wickedness; guilt; crime.

I could never be convinced of any such criminousness in him, as willingly to expose his life to the stroke of justice and malice of his enemies. King Charles

CRIMOSIN. † adj. [cremosino, Italian, commonly written as it is pronounced, crimson.] A species of red colour, tinged with blue.

Upon her head a cremosin coronet,
With damask roses and daffodilies set,
Bay leaves between,
And primroses green.

Embellish the white violet. Spenser, Shep. Cal. April.

CRIMP. † adj. [from crumple or crimble, Dr. Johnson says. It is, however, from the Sax. verb acrymman, friare.]

1. Friable; brittle: easily crumbled; easily reduced to powder.

Now the fowler warn'd
By these good omens, with swift early steps,
Treads the crimp earth, ranging through fields and glades.
Philips.

2. Not consistent; not forcible. A low cant word.

The evidence is crimp; the witnesses swear backwards and forwards, and contradict themselves; and his tenants stick by him. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

CRIMP.  n. s.*

1. A game at cards formerly.

Laugh, and keep company, at gleek or crimp.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

2. In modern times, one who is employed to enlist soldiers, but not in the usual manner by beat of drum; one who unfairly decoys others into military service; a low word.

To CRIMP.  v. a.* [Sax. ge-crympt, crimped, cala-mistratus, Lye.]

1. To curl or crisp the hair. See To CALAMISTRATE.

2. In modern cookery, applied to cod-fish; as, to crimp cod, is to cut the fish, while very fresh, into slices, and to throw it into pump water and salt.
This renders it crisp.

To CRIMPLE. † v. a. [from rample, crumple, crimple, Dr. Johnson says; but this sonorous triad must give way to the Teut. krimpen, to contract.] To contract; to corrugate: to cause to shrink or contract.

He passed the cantery through them, and accordingly crim- pled them up. Wise man's Surgery.

CRIMSON. † n. s. [Ital. cremosino, and chermisi;
Fr. cramoisi; low Lat. kermesinus; from the Arabic kermes; a little worm which is bred in the berry of the coccus, made use of to dye this colour.]

1. Red, somewhat darkened with blue.

As crimson seems to be little else than a very deep red, with an eye of blue; so some kinds of red seem to be little else than heightened yellow. Boyle on Colours.

2. Red in general.

Can you blame her then, being a maid yet rosed over with the virgin crimson of modesty, if she deny the appearance of a naked blind boy, in her naked seeing self.

Shakspeare Hen. V.

CRIMSON.  adj.* [The adjective is not noticed by

Dr. Johnson, though among the examples to the substantive, in his dictionary, several of them present the adjective.]

1. Red, somewhat darkened, with blue.
Why does the soil endure
The blushing poppy with a crimson hue? Prior.
2. Red, in general.

Beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in thy lips, and in thy cheeks Shakspeare.
The crimson stream stain'd his arms around. Dryden.

TO CRIMSON. v. a. [from the noun.] To dye with crimson.

Pardon me, Julius. — Here wast thou bay'd, brave hart:
Here didst thou fall; and here thy hunters stand
Sign'd in thy spoil, and crimson'd in thy leth. Shakspeare.

CRINCUM. n. s. [a cant word.] A cramp: a contraction; whimsy.

For jealousy is but a kind
Of clap and crincum of the mind. Hudibras.

CRINGE. † n. s. [from the verb.] Bow? servile civility.

These travellers, in lieu of the ore of Ophir wherewith they should come home richly freighted, may be said to make their return in apes and owls, in a cargazon of complements and cringes, or some huge monstrous periwigs, which is the golden fleece they bring over with them.

Howell, Instr. For. Trav. p. 188.

By this time Appetite is at the table,
And with a lowly cringe presents the wine
To his old master Gustus.

Let me be grateful; but let far from me
Be fawning cringe, and false dissembling looks. Philips.

TO CRINGE. † v. a. [kriechen, German. Probably from the Iceland. kringe, to turn round.] To draw together; to contract.

Whip him, fellows,
Till, like a boy, you see him cringe his face,
And whine aloud for mercy. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

TO CRINGE. † v. n. [kriechen, German.] To bow; to pay court with bows; to fawn; to flatter.

One so superstitiously devout, that he is ready to cringe and crouch to every stock! Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 61.

Flatterers have the flexor muscles so strong, that they are always howling and cringing. Arbutnot.

The cringing knave, who seeks a place
Without success, thus tells his case. Swift.

CRINGER.  n. s.* [from cringe, Germ. kriechen, a cringing fellow.] One who is always bowing and cringing for some mean purpose: a flatterer.

CRINGEROUS. adj. [criniger, Lat.] Hairy; overgrown with hair. Dict.

CRINITE.  adj.* [Lat. crinitus.] Having the appearance of hair; streaming.

How comate, crinite, caudate stars are form'd.
Fairfax, Tass. xiv. 44.

TO CRINKLE. v. n. [krinkel, Dutch.] To go in and out; to run in flexures: diminutive of crankle.

Unless some sweetness at the bottom lie,
Who cares for all the crinkling of the pie? King's Cookery.

TO CRINKLE. † v. a. To mould into inequalities.

Her face all bousy,
Comely crinkled,
Wondrously wrinkled. Skelton's Poems, p. 124.

CRINKLE. † n. s. [from the verb.] A wrinkle; a sinuosity.

It is the crinkles in this glass making objects appear double.
Search's Freewill, Foreknowledge, &c. p. 114.

CRINOSE. adj. [from crinis, Lat.] Hairy. Dict.

CRINO'SITY. n. s. [from crinose.] Hairiness. Dict.

CRIPPLE. n. s. [crýpel, Sax. krepel, Dutch; cripl, Welsh. See CREEPLE. Mr. Whiter refers this word to "grapple, which means to confine by seizing or holding any thing; and the idea of confinement or hindrance brings us at once to the term cripple." Etym. Magn. p. 132. Junius has strangely deduced it from the Gr. κραπαλλη, a crapula. It is true that κραπαλλης are those who totter, no doubt from κραπαλλη; i. e. those who have drunk too much, and cannot stand. But the origin of our word cripple, is clearly from creep, to move slowly.] A lame man; one that has lost or never enjoyed the use of his limbs. Donne with great appearance of propriety writes it creple, from creep.

He, poor man, by your first order died,
And that a winged Mercury did bear:
Some tardy cripple had the countermand,
That came too lag to see him buried. Shakspeare.

I am a cripple in my limbs; but what decays are in my mind, the reader must determine. Dryden.

Among the rest, there was a lame cripple from his birth,
Whom Paul commanded to stand upright on his feet. Bentley.

See the blind beggar dance, the cripple sing,
The sot a hero, lunatick a king. Pope.

CRIPPLE.  adj.* Lame.

And chide the cripple tardy-gaited night,
Who, like a foul and ugly witch, doth limp
So tediously away. Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

TO CRIPPLE. † v. a. [from the noun.] To lame; to make lame; to deprive of the use of limbs.

Thou cold sciatica,
Cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt
As lamely as their manners! Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

Knots upon his gouty joints appear,
And chalk is in his crippled fingers found. Dryden.

Tettyx, the dancing-master, threw himself from the rock, but was crippled in the fall. Addison.

CRIPPLENESS. n. s. [from cripple.] Lameness; privation of the limbs. Dict.

CRISIS. n. s. [κρίσις.]

1. The point in which the disease kills, or changes to the better; the decisive moment when sentence is passed.

Wise leeches will not vain receipts obtrude:
Deaf to complaints, they wait upon the ill,
Till some safe crisis authorize their skill. Dryden.

2. The point of time at which any affair comes to the height.

This hour's the very crisis of your fate;
Your good or ill, your infamy or fame,
And all the colour of your life depends
On this important now. Dryden, Spem. Fr.

The undertaking, which I am now laying down, entered upon in the very crisis of the late rebellion, who was the duty of every Briton to contribute his utmost assistance to the government, in a manner suitable to his station: abilities. Addison, Frecholder.

CRISP. † adj. [crupp, Sax. crispus, Lat.]

1. Curled.

Bulls are more crisp on the forehead than cows. Bacon.
The Ethiopian black, flat nosed, and crisp haired. Hale.

2. Indented; winding; or alluding to the little wave or curl, as it is commonly called, which the gentlest wind occasions on the surface of waters. See the 3d sense of TO CRISP.

You nymphs, call'd Naiads, of the wandering brooks,
With your sedg'd crowns, and ever-harsh looks,
Leave your crisp channels, and on this green land
Answer your summons; Juno does command. Shakspeare, Tempest.

3. Brittle; friable.

In frosty weather, musick within doors soundeth better; which may be by reason not of the disposition of the air, but of the wood or string of the instrument, which is made more crisp, and so more porous and hollow. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

4. Short; brisk.

Friar, you must leave
Your neat crisp claret, and fall to your cyder
A while. Bedum, and Fl. Bloody Brother.

To CRISP.† n. a. [cipprian, to crisp; Lat crispo.]

1. To curl; to contract into knots or curls.

Severn,—affrighted with their bloody looks,
Rar, fearfully among the trembling reeds,
And hid his crisp'd head in the hollow bank.
Shakespeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

Young I'd have him too,
Yet a man, with crisp'd hair,
Cast in thousand snares and rings,
For love's fingers, and his rings. B. Jonson.
Spirit of wine is not only unfit for inflammations in general, but also crisps up the vessels of the dura mater and brain, and sometimes produces a gangrene. Sharp's Surg.

2. To twist; to curl; as was the manner of decorating gardens in Milton's time; who also speaks of "curling a grove with ringlets quaint," Arcades, ver. 46.; and represents Leisure "taking his pleasure in trim gardens," Il Pens. ver. 50. Herrick has "the crisp'd yew," that is, trimmed, shaped. Hesperides, 1648. p. 337.

Along the crisp'd shades and bowers,
Revels the spruce and jocund spring. Milton, Com.

3. To indent; to make to wave.

From that saphire fount the crisp'd brooks,
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
Ran nectar, visiting each plant. Milton, P. L.

To CRISP.* v. n. To curl.

Their hair crisps, but grows longer than the Africans.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 337.

CRISPATION. n. s. [from crisp.]

1. The act of curling.

2. The state of being curled.

Some differ in the hair and feathers, both in the quantity, crispation, and colours of them; as he lions are hirsute, and have great manes; the she's are smooth, like cats. Bacon.

CRISPING-IRON.* n. s. [from crisp.] A curling iron.

For never powder, nor the crispings-iron
Shall touch these dangling locks.
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

CRISPING-PIN. n. s. [from crisp.] A curling iron.

The changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crispings-pins. Isaiah, iii. 22.

CRISPISULCANT. adj. [crispisulcans, Lat.] Waved, or undulating; as lightning is represented. D'ct.

CRISPNESS. n. s. [from crisp.] Curledness.

CRISPY. adj. [from crisp.] Curled.

So are those crispy snaky locks, oft known
To be the dowry of a second head.

Shakespeare, Merch. of Venice.
CRISS-CROSS-ROW.* [a corruption of Christ-Cross-Row, which see. See also Cross-row.] Alphabet; beginning.

She is not come to the criss-cross-row of her perfection yet.
Southerne.

CRITERION.† n. s. [κρίτηριον, Gr. formerly written critierium; the plural is criteria.] A mark by which any thing is judged of, with regard to its goodness or badness.

Of the diseases of the mind there is no critierium, no canon, no rule. Donne, Letters, p. 288.

Mutual agreement and endearments was the badge of primitive believers; but we may be known by the contrary criterion Glanville, Scepsis.

We have here a sure infallible criterion, by which every man may discover and find out, the gracious or ungracious disposition of his own heart. South.

By what criterion do ye eat, d'ye think,
If this is priz'd for sweetness, that for stink? Pope, Ilor.

CRITICK.† n. s. [old Fr. critiquér; modern, critiqueur, critique; from the Gr. κρίτικος.] The first definition, which Dr. Johnson has given of this word, presents not the earliest usage of it.
The last is probably the earliest; under which, however, he has sought no authority more ancient than that of Swift. Cowel, as Mr. Malone also thinks, is perhaps the first author who uses critick in the sense of Dr. Johnson's primary definition; though Cotgrave, I must also observe, renders critiqueur,
"a critique, a controller, or corrector of other men's works or doings." Shakspeare had long before used it in the sense of a cynick or cen-surer.†

1. A man skilled in the art of judging of literature: a man able to distinguish the faults and beauties of writing.

The word certiorari is used diverse times in the Digest of the Civil Law; but our later criticks think it so barbarous, that they suspect it to be rather foisted in by Tribonian.

Cowel, Law Interpreter, 1607.

This settles truer ideas in men's minds of several things, whercof we read the names in ancient authors, than all the large and laborious arguments of criticks. Locke.

Now learn what morals criticks ought to show,
For 'tis but half a judge's task to know. Pope.

2. An examiner; a judge. But see CRITIQUE.

But you with pleasure own your errors past,
And make each day a critick on the last. Pope.

3. A snarler; a carper; a caviller.

Criticks I saw, that others' names deface,
And fix their own with labour in their place. Pope.

Where an author has many beauties consistent with virtue, piety, and truth, let not little criticks exalt themselves, and shower down their ill-nature. Watts.

4. A censurer; a man apt to find fault.

My adder's sense

To critick and to flatterer stopped are. Shakspeare, Sonn. 122.

Do not give advantage

To stubborn criticks, apt, without a theme,

For depravation.

Shakspeare, Tr. and Cr.

My chief design, next to seeing you, is to be a severe critick on you and your neighbour. Swift.

CRITICK. adj. Critical; relating to criticism; relating to the art of judging of literary performances.

Thence arts o'er all the northern world advance,
But critick learning flourish'd most in France. Pope.

CRITICK.† n. s. Critical examination. See CRITIQUE.

To CRITICK.† v. n. [from critick.] To play the critick; to criticise.

Nay, if you begin to critick once, we shall never have done.

Brewer's Com. of Lingua, (1657.) v. 9.

They do but trace over the paths that have been beaten by the antients; or comment, critick, and flourish upon them.

Temple.

CRITICAL. adj. [from critick.]

1. Exact; nicely judicious; accurate; diligent.

It is submitted to the judgement of more critical ears, to direct and determine what is graceful and what is not. Holder.

Virgil was so critical in the rites of religion, that he would never have brought in such prayers as these, if they had not been agreeable to the Roman customs. Stillingfleet.

2. Relating to criticism: as, he wrote a critical dissertation on the last play.

3. Captious; inclined to find fault; censorious,

What wouldst thou write of me, if thou shouldst praise me? —

— O, gentle lady, do not put me to't;

For I am nothing, if not critical. Shakspeare, Othello.

4. [From crisis.] Comprising the time at which a great event is determined.

The moon is supposed to be measured by sevens, and the critical or decretory days to be dependent on that number.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

5. Decisive; nice.

Opportunity is in respect to time, in some sense, as time is in respect to eternity: it is the small moment, the exact point the critical minute, on which every good work so much depends.

Sprat, Serm.

The people cannot but resent to see their apprehensions of the power of France, in so critical a juncture, wholly laid aside.

Swift.

6. Producing a crisis or change of the disease: as, a critical sweat.

CRITICALLY. adv. [from critical.]

1. In a critical manner; exactly; curiously.

Difficult it is to understand the purity of English, and critically to discern good writers from bad, and a proper stile from a corrupt one.

Dryden.

These shells which are digged up out of the earth, several hundreds of which I now keep by me, have been nicely and critically examined by very many learned men.

Woodward.

2. At the exact point of time.

CRITICALNESS. n. s. [from critical.] Exactness; accuracy; nicety; incidence at a particular point of time.

To CRITICISE. v. n. [from critick.]

1. To play the critick; to judge; to write remarks upon any performance of literature; to point out faults and beauties.

They who can criticise so weakly, as to imagine I have done my worst, may be convinced, at their own cost, that I can write severely with more ease than I can gently.

Dryden.

Know well each ancient's proper character,

Without all this at once before your eyes,

Cavil you may, but never criticise.

Pope.

2. To animadvert upon as faulty.

Nor would I have his father look so narrowly into these accounts, as to take occasion from thence to criticise on his expenses.

Locke.

To CRITICISE. v. a. [from critick.] To censure; to pass judgement upon.

Nor shall I look upon it as any breach of charity to criticise the author, so long as I keep clear of the person.

Addison.

CRITICISER.  n. s.* [from criticise.] One who makes or writes remarks.

Others took upon them to be pert criticisers and saucy correctors of the original before them.

Blackwall, Sac. Class. (1731) ii. 265.

CRITICISM. n. s. [from critick.]

1. Criticism, as it was first instituted by Aristotle, was meant a standard of judging well.

Dryden, State of Innocence, Pref.

2. Remark; animadversion; critical observations.

There is not a Greek or Latin critick who has not shewn, even in the stile of his criticisms, that he was a master of all the eloquence and delicacy of his native tongue.

Addison.

CRITIQUE. † n. s. [Fr. See CRITICK. This word is now generally so written, to distinguish it from critick, the person; and accordingly some of Dr. Johnson's examples give it critique; though so lately, as when Pope wrote, no distinction of the spelling or accent obtained; and it may be doubted, whether Dr. Johnson has not, in his third definition of the person, by applying to it what probably belongs to the thing, overlooked this confusion.]

1. A critical examination; critical remarks; animadversions.

I should be glad if I could persuade him to continue his good offices, and write such another critick on any thing of mine.

Dryden.

I should as soon expect to see a critique on the poetry of a ring, as on the inscription of a medal.

Addison on Medals.

2. Science of criticism.

If ideas and words were distinctly weighed, and duly considered, they would afford us another sort of logic and critick than what we have been hitherto acquainted with.

Locke.

What is every year of a wise man's life, but a censure and critique on the past?

Pope.

Not that my quill to criticks was confin'd,

My verse gave ampler lessons to mankind.

Pope.

To CROAK. † v. n. [croaccan, Saxon; croacre, Italian; crocitare, Latin. Dr. Johnson says. But it is perhaps adopted from the old Fr. croâquer.]

1. To make a hoarse low noise, like a frog.

The subtle swallow flies about the brook,

- And querulous frogs in muddy pools do croak.

May, Virgil.

So when Jove's block descended from on high,

Lowd thunder to its bottom shook the bog,

And the hoarse nation croak'd.

Pope.

Blood, stuff'd in skins, is British Christians' food;

- And France robs marshes of the croaking brood.

Gay.

2. To caw or cry as a raven or crow.

The raven himself is hoarse,

That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan

Under my battlements.

Shakspeare.

The hoarse raven, on the blasted bough,

By croaking from the left, presag'd the coming blow.

Dryden.

At the same time the walk of elms, with the croaking of the ravens, looks exceeding solemn and venerable.

Addison.

3. It may be used in contempt for any disagreeable or offensive murmur.

Their understandings are but little instructed, when all their whole time and pains is laid out to still the croaking of their own bellies.

Locke.

CROAK. † n. s. [croâc, old Fr. the croaking of ravens, &c. V. Cotgrave.] The cry or voice of a frog or raven.

The swallow skims the river's watry face,

The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious race.

Dryden.

Was that a raven's croak, or my son's voice?

No matter which, I'll to the grave and hide me.

Lec.

CROAKER.  n. s.* [from croak.] A word, in modern times, used in contempt for those who are perpetually descanting on dangers and difficulties, and making unfair comparisons of the present with the past.

CROATS.  n. s.* In military history, irregular troops, formed of natives of Croatia.

The manners, government, religion, language, and custom of the Croats, are similar to those of Slavonia and Transylvania: they are excellent irregular troops, and as such are named in modern history, under the name of Pandours, and various other designations.

Guthrie, Transylvania.

CROCEOUS. adj. [croceus, Lat.] Consisting of saffron; like saffron.

Dict.

CROCATIÖN. n. s. [crocatio, Lat.] The croaking of frogs or ravens.

Dict.

CROCK. † n. s. [croccan, Sax. krok, kruick, Gael. kruik, Dutch; kruka, Goth. Chaucer writes our word croûke.]

1. A cup; any vessel made of earth.

Therefore the vulgar dui about him flocke,—

Like foolish flies unto an hony crocke. Spenser, F. Q. v. ii. 33.

2. A little stool. [perhaps a corruption of cricket; of which see the third sense.]

I bid her come out of the croud, and seated her upon a little crock at my left hand.

Tatler, No. 116.

3. The black or soot of a pot, or a kettle, or chimney-stock, is called crook.

Ray, South and East Country Words.

CROCKERY.† n. s. [epochræpe, Sax.] Earthen ware.

CROCODILE.† n. s. [from κρόκος, 'saffron,' and δαίμων, fearing, Dr. Johnson says. In this opinion he is supported by other writers; among whom is Fuller, who quaintly observes, that "crocodiles' tears are never true, save when he is forced where saffron grows, knowing himself to be all poison, and it to be all antidote; whence he is called the saffron-fearer." We have, however, no authentick proofs of this fear. Others derive it from κρόκος, the shore, and δαίμων, fearing; as if fearing snares there laid for it. V. Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. & Gr. But this is not probable; as the animal perpetually frequents the banks or shore, instead of being afraid of them. Sir T. Herbert, the traveller, speaking of the alligator, or crocodile, says, "the name we give is a crocco colore, or per-antiphrasin quod crocum timcat." Trav. p. 364. See ALLIGATOR.] An amphibious voracious animal, in shape resembling a lizard, and found in Egypt and the Indies. It is covered with very hard scales, which cannot, without great difficulty, be pierced; except under the belly, where the skin is tender. It has a wide throat, with several rows of teeth, sharp and separated, which enter one another. It runs with great swiftness; but does not easily turn itself. It is long lived, and is said to grow continually to its death. Some are fifteen or eighteen cubits long. Crocodiles lay their eggs, resembling goose-eggs, sometimes amounting to sixty, near the water-side, covering them with the sand, that the heat of the sun may hatch them. Culmet.

Gloster's show

Beguiles him; as the mournful crocodile,
With sorrow, snares relenting passengers.

Crocodiles were thought to be peculiar unto the Nile.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

Cæsar will weep, the crocodile will weep.

Dryden.

Enticing crocodiles, whose tears are death;
Syréns, that murder with enchanting breath.

Granville.

Crocodile is also a little animal, otherwise called stinx, very much like the lizard, or small crocodile. It lives by land and water; has four short small legs, a very sharp muzzle, and a short small tale. It is pretty enough to look at, being covered all over with little scales of the colour of silver, intermixt with brown, and of a gold colour upon the back. It always remains little. Trevour.

CROCODILINE. adj. [crocodilinus, Lat.] Like a crocodile. Dict.

CROCUS.† n. s. [old Fr. crocus, Lat. crocus. "Ce mot vient du Peruan." Lacombe.] A flower.

Fair-handed Spring unbosoms every grace,
Throws out the snow-drop and the crocus first.

Thomson.

CROFT. n. s. [epoch, Saxo.] A little close joining to a house, that is used for corn or pasture.

This have I learn'd,

Tending my flocks hard by, i' th' hilly crofts

That brow this bottom glade.

Milton, Com.

CROISA'DE.† n. s. [croisade, Fr. from croix, a cross.]
CROISA'DO. } A holy war; a war carried on against infidels under the banner of the cross.

If envy make thy labours prove thy loss,
No marvel if a croisade wear the cross.

Verses Pref. to Fuller's Holy War.

See that he take the name of Urban, because a pope of that name did first institute the croisade; and, as with an holy trumpet, did stir up the voyage for the Holy Land. Bacon.

CROISES.† n. s. [old Fr. crois for croix; old Eng. crois, Ch.]

1. Pilgrims who carry a cross.
2. Soldiers who fight against infidels under the banner of the cross.

The conquests of the croises, extending over Palestine and a part of Syria, had been erected into a sovereignty under the name of the kingdom of Jerusalem.

Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist. iii. 7.

CRO'MLECHE.* [In British antiquity, from the Welsh crom, crooked, and llech, a flat stone, according to Richards; from the Heb. carm-luach, a devoted stone or altar.] Huge, broad, flat stones, raised upon other stones set up on end for that purpose. They are common in Anglesey, and are supposed to be the remains of altars. See Rowland's Mona Antiqua Restaurata.

CRONE. n. s. [crone, Sax. according to Verstegan; kronie, Dut. according to Skinner.]

1. An old ewe.

Fresh herrings plenty Michel brings,
With fatted crones, and such old things.

Tassier.

2. In contempt, an old woman.

Take up the bastard,

Take't up, I say; give't to thy crone. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

The crone being in bed with him on the wedding-night, and finding his aversion, endeavours to win his affection by reason.

Dryden.

CRO'NET. n. s. The hair which grows over the top of an horse's hoof.

CRO'NICAL, or CRO'NYCAL. adj. The same as ACRONYCAL, which see.

Cronychall, or acronychail, that is, vespertine, or at the beginning of night.

More, Notes on Psych. p. 425.

Why far remov'd with so vast distance,
When they [the planets] go down with setting cronical.

More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 72.

CRO'NY. n. s. [a cant word.] An old acquaintance; a companion of long standing.

So when the Scots, your constant cronies,

Th' e-pousers of your cause and monies.

Hudibras.

To oblige your crony Swift,

Bring our dame a new year's gift.

Swift.

Strange, an astrologer should die,

Without one wonder in the sky!

Not one of all his crony stars,

To pay their duty at his herse?

Swyt.

CROOK.† n. s. [Celt. crok; Su. Goth. krok; Fr. croc. See TO CROOK.]

1. Any crooked or bent instrument.

2. A sheephook.

I sing the man who Judah's sceptre bore,

In that right hand which held the crook before.

Cowley.

He left his crook, he left his flocks,

And wand'ring through the lonely rocks,

He nourish'd endless woe.

Prior.

3. Any thing bent; a meander.

There fall those sapphire-colour'd brooks,

Which, conduit like, with curious crooks,

Sweet islands make in that sweet land.

Sidney.

4. An artifice; a trick; "by hook or crook," i. e. by bending a thing to one's purpose.

I neither therein have foil nor trip; but, for all your bragges, hookes, and crookes, you have such a fall, as you shall never be able to stand upright again in this matter.

Abp. Cramer to Bp. Gardiner.

5. A gibbet. [Fr. croce, from the Lat. crux. So Hulot uses cross for a gibbet.]

Terpine—

She caus'd to be attacht and forthwith left

Unto the crooks—

Where he full shamefully was hang'd by the head.

To CROOK. † v. a. [Su. Goth. kroka, to crook; Fr. crocher, or voquer.]

1. To bend; to turn into a hook.

Why should the poor be flatter'd?

No! let the candied tongue lick absurd pomp;

And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,

Where thrift may follow fawning. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

It is highly probable, that this disease proceeds from a redundant acidity, because vinegar will soften and crook tender bones. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CROSS.* n. s. [Welsh, croes; bas Bret. croas, croes; croix, Fr. croce, Ital. crux, Latin.]

1. One strait body laid at right angles over another;
the instrument by which the Saviour of the world suffered death.

They make a little cross of a quill, long ways of that part of the quill which hath the pith, and crossways of that piece of the quill without pith. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

You are first to consider seriously the infinite love of your Saviour, who offered himself for you as a sacrifice upon the cross. Bp. Taylor, Guide to the Penitent.

2. The ensign of the Christian religion.

And on his brest a bloodie cross he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lorde,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he bore.

Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 2

We do sign him with the sign of the cross, in token that hereafter he shall not be ashamed to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and manfully to fight under his banner against sin, the world, and the devil, and to continue Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto his life's end.

Ministration of Publick Baptism.

Her holy faith and Christian cross oppos'd Against the Saxon gods. Rowe.

whensoever I should love. Sidney.

Then let us teach our trial patience,
Because it is a customary cross. Shakspeare.

Heaven prepares good men with crosses; but no ill can happen to a good man. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

A great estate hath great crosses, and a mean fortune hath but small ones. Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

6. Money so called, because marked with a cross.

He was said to make soldiers spring up out of the very earth to follow him, though he had not a cross to pay them salary.

Howell, Vocal Forest.

Whereas we cannot much lament our loss,
Who neither carry'd back nor brought one cross. Dryden.

7. Cross and Pile, a play with money; at which it is put to chance whether the side, which bears a cross, shall lie upward, or the other.

Whatum had neither cross nor pile;
His plunder was not worth the while. Hudibras.

This I humbly conceive to be perfect boys play; cross, I win, and pile, you lose; or, what's yours is mine, and what's mine is my own. Swift.

8. Church lands in Ireland.

The absolute palatines made their own judges, so as the king's writ did not run in those counties, but only in the church lands lying within the same, which were called the cross; wherein the king made a sheriff; so in each of these counties palatines there was one sheriff of the liberty, and another of the cross. Sir J. Davies.

CROSS.* adj. [from the substantive.]

1. Transverse; falling a thwart something else.

Whatsoever penumbra should be made in the circles by the cross refraction of the second prism, that penumbra would be conspicuous in the right lines which touch those circles. Newton.

The sun, in that space of time, by his annual contrary motion eastward, will be advanced near a degree of the ecliptick, cross to the motion of the equator. Holder on Time.

towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection of cross ones. Benkeny.

2. Oblique; lateral.

Was this a face,
To stand against the deep dread bolted thunder?
In the most terrible and nimble stroke
Of quick cross lightning?
The cross like lightning seem'd to open
The breast of heaven.
The harms of thwarting thunder blue,
Or what the cross dire-looking planet smites.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.
Milton, Arcades.

3. Adverse; opposite; often with to.

We're both love's captives; but with fate so cross,
One must be happy by the other's loss.
Dryden.
Cross to our interests, curbing sense and sin;
Oppress'd without, and undermin'd within,
It thrives through pain.
It runs cross to the belief and apprehension of the rest of mankind; a difficulty, which a modest and good man is scarce able to encounter.
Dryden.
Atterbury.

4. Perverse; untractable.

When, through the cross circumstances of a man's temper or condition, the enjoyment of a pleasure would certainly expose him to a greater inconvenience, then religion bids him quit it.
South.

5. Peevish; fretful; ill-humoured. [Welsh, croes, surly.]

Did ever any man upon the rack afflict himself, because he had received a cross answer from his mistress?
All cross and distasteful humours, and whatever else may render the conversation of men grievous and uneasy to one another, must be shunned.
Tillotson.

6. Contrary; contradictory.

The mind bring all the ends of a long and various hypothesis together; sees how one part coheres with, and depends upon another; and so clears off all the appearing contrarieties and contradictions, that seem'd to lie cross and uncouth, and to make the whole unintelligible.
South.

7. Contrary to wish; unfortunate.

We learn the great reasonableness of not only a contented, but also a thankful acquiescence in any condition, and under the *cross*est and severest passages of Providence.
I cannot, without some regret, behold the cross and unlucky issue of my design; for by my dislike of disputes, I am engag'd in one.
South.
Glanville.

8. Interchanged.

Evarechus made a cross marriage also with Dorilaus's sister, and shortly left her with child of the famous Pyrocles.
Cross marriages, between the king's son and the archduke's daughter; and again, between the archduke's son and the king's daughter.
Sidney.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

To allow benefit of clergy, and to restrain the press, seems to have something of cross-purpose in it. Shaftesbury.

To CROSSQUESTION.* v. a. [cross and question.] To cross-examine.

They were so narrowly sifted, so craftily examined, and cross-questioned by the Jewish magistrates, &c.

Killingbeck, Sermon. p. 127.

CROSSROAD.* n. s. [cross and road.] A road across the country; not the direct high-road.

The carriages taking the road to Varennes, he went a cross-road to rejoin them. Guthrie, Geog. France.

CROSSROW. n. s. [cross and row.] Alphabet; so named because a cross is placed at the beginning, to show that the end of learning is piety.

He hearkens after prophecies and dreams,

And from the crossrow plucks the letter G;

And says a wizard told him, that by G

His issue disinherited should be. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

CROSSWAY.* n. s. [cross and way.] A small obscure path intersecting the chief road; or the place, where one road intersects another.

Neither shouldst thou have stood in the cross-way.

Obadiah, ver. 14.

Damn'd spirits all,

That in crossways and floods have burial,

Already to their wormy beds are gone.

Shakespeare.

CROSSWIND.* n. s. [cross and wind.] Wind blowing from the right or left.

The least unhappy persons do, in so fickle and so tempestuous a sea as this world, meet with many more either crosswinds or stormy gusts than prosperous gales. Boyle.

CROSSWORT.* n. s. [from cross and wort.]

It hath soft leaves, like the ladies bedstraw, from which it differs in the number of leaves, that are produced at every joint; which in this are only four, disposed in form of a cross. Miller.

CROTCH. n. s. [croc, Fr.] A hook or fork.

There is a tradition of a dilemma, that Moreton used to raise the benevolence to higher rates; and some called it his fork, and some his crotch. Bacon, Rich. VII.

Save elme, ash, and crab-tree for cart and for plough,
Save step for a stile of the crotch and the bough. Tusser.

CRO'TCHET.* n. s. [crochet, Fr.]

1. [In musick.] One of the notes or characters of time, equal to half a minim, and double a quaver.

Chambers.

As a good harper, stricken far in years,
Into whose cunning hands the gout doth fall,
All his old crotchets in his brain he bears,
But on his harp plays ill, or not at all.

Davies.

2. A support; a piece of wood fitted into another to support a building. [from croch, a brk.]

A stately temple shoots within the skies,
The crotchets of their cot in columns rise.

Dryden.

3. [In printing.] Hooks in which words are included [thus.]

4. A perverse conceit; an odd fancy.

[They] set all in an uproar by their new doctrines, paradoxes, fignments, crotchets; make new divisions, &c.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 653.

His quaint erotchet of people and people—cannot but be hissed at by any of sound judgement.

Bp. Morton, Discharge, &c. p. 87.

This is but a crotchet of the law, but that brought against it is plain scripture. Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.
All the devices and crotchets of new inventions, which crept into her, tended either to twitch or enlarge the ivy. Howell.

The horse smelt him out, and presently a crotchet came in his head how he might countermine him. L'Estrange.

C R O

To CRO'TCHET.* v. n. [from the noun.] To play in a measured time of musick.

The nimblest crocheting musician. Donne, Poems, p. 68.

CRO'TCHETED.* part. adj. [from crotchct.] Distinguished by musical notation.

Not these cantels and morsels of scripture warbled, quavered, and crotchcted, to give pleasure unto the ears.

Harnas, Tr. of Beza's Sermon. (1587,) p. 267.

To CROUCH.* v. n. [crochu, crooked, French, Dr. Johnson says. The German kriechen, to creep, however, seems preferable; though indeed formerly our word was sometimes written crooching.]

1. To stoop low; to lie close to the ground; as the lion crouches to his master.

You know the voice, and now crouch like a cur,

Ta'en worrying sheep.

Beaumont and Fl. Martial Maul.

2. To fawn; to bend servilely; to stoop meanly.

Every one that is left in thine house, shall come and crouch to him for a piece of silver and a morsel of bread.

1 Sam. ii. 36.

At his heels,

Leasht in like hounds, should famine, sword and fire,

Crouch for Employment.

Shakespeare, Hen. V.

• They fawn and crouch to men of parts, whom they cannot ruin; quote them, when they are present; and, when they are absent, steal their jests.

Dryden.

Too well the vigour of that arm they know;

They lick the dust, and crouch beneath their fatal foe.

Dryden.

Your shameful story shall record of me,

The men all crouch'd, and left a woman free.

Dryden.

To CROUCH.* v. a. [Fr. cruche, Sax. cpuce, the cross.]

To sign with the cross; to bless. Not now in use.

I crouche thee from elves, and from wightes.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale.

CROUCH-BACK.* See CROOK-BACK, and CROUCHED Friars.

CROUCHED Friars.* n. s. [from To crouch.] An order of friars formerly in this country; so called from the cross which they wore; often written cruched or crutchel.

With Edward went his brother Edmund, earl of Lancaster, surnamed crouch-back; not that he was crook-shouldered, or camel-backed, but from the cross, anciently called a crouch, (whence crouched friars,) which now he wore in his voyage to Jerusalem. Fuller, Holy War, p. 215.

CROUD.* See CROWD.

CROUP.* n. s. [croupe, Fr.]

1. The rump of a fowl.

2. The buttocks of a horse.

CROUPA'DES. n. s. [from croup.] Higher leaps than those of corvets, that keep the fore and hind quarters of the horse in an equal height, so that he trusses his legs under his belly without jerking.

Farrier's Dict.

CROW. n. s. [cnap, Saxon; corvus.]

• A large black bird that feeds upon the carcasses of beasts.

The crows and choughs, that wing the midway air,
Shew scarce so gross as beetles. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

To crows he like impartial grace affords,
And choughs and daws, and such republick birds. Dryden.

2. To pluck a Crow, is to be industrious or contentious about that which is of no value.

If you dispute, we must even pluck a crow about it. L'Estrange.

Resolve before we go,
That you and I must pull a crow. Hudibras.

3. A bar of iron, with a beak, used as a lever to force open doors; as the Latins called a hook corvus.

The crow is used as a lever to lift up the ends of great heavy timber, and then they thrust the claws between the ground and the timber; and lying some stuff behind the crow, they draw the other end of the shank backwards, and so raise the timber. Moxon's Mech. Ewer.

Get me an iron crow, and bring it straight
Unto my cell. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

Against the gate employ your crows of iron. Southerners

4. [From crow.] The voice of a cock, or the noise which he makes in his gaiety.

CROWFLOWER.* n. s. In botany, a kind of carnation.

Fantastick garlands did she make
Of crow-flowers, nettles, daisies, and long purples. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

The crow-flower, and thereby the clover-flower they stick. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 15.

CROWFOOT.† n. s. [from crow and foot; in Latin, ranunculus.] A flower.

There crowfeet did their purple bells unfold,
And the smooth kingcup shone with leaves of gold. Coxall's Poems.

CROWFOOT. n. s. [from crow and foot.] A caltrop or piece of iron with four points, two, three, or four inches long; so that, whatever way it falls, one point is up. It is used in war for incommoding the cavalry. Military Dict.

To Crow.† v. n. preterit. I crew, or crowed; I have crowed. [capan, Sax.]

1. To make the noise which a cock makes in gaiety, or defiance.

But even then the morning cock crew loud. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Diogenes called an ill physician, cock. Why? saith he. Diogenes answered, Because when you crow, men use to rise. Bacon.

That the lion trembles at the crowing of the cock, king James, upon trial, found to be fabulous. Hakevill.

Within this homestead liv'd, without a peer
For crowing loud, the noble Chanticleer,
So high her cock. Dryden, Fables.

2. To boast; to bully; to vapour; to bluster; to swagger.

Vaunting Sennacherib crowing over poor Jerusalem. Bp. Hall's Works, ii. 350.

Selby is crowing, and though always defeated by his wife, still crowing on. Grandison.

CROWD.† n. s. [cþuð, cnead, Sax.]

1. A multitude confusedly pressed together.
2. A promiscuous medley, without order or distinction.

He could then compare the confusion of a multitude to that tumult he had observed in the Icarian sea, dashing and breaking among its crowd of islands. Pope.

3. The vulgar; the populace.

He went not with the crowd to see a shrine,
But by the way, with food divine. Dryden, Fables.

4. [From crwth, Welch.] A fiddle.

When he came, and nighed to the house, he herd a symfonie and a croude. Wicliffe, St. Luke, xv.

Hark how the minstrels gin to shrill aloud
Their metry musick that resounds from far,
The pipe, the tabor and the trembling croud, Spenser, Epithal.

That well agree withuten breach or jar.
Let them freely sing and dance, have their poppet-plays, hobby-horses, tubers, crouds, bag-pipes, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 273.

His fiddle is your proper purchase,
Won in the service of the churches;
And by your doom must be allow'd
To be, or be no more, a crowd. Hudibras.

To Crowd. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To fill with confused multitudes.

A mind which is ever crowding its memory with things which it learns, may cram the invention itself. Watts.

2. To press close together.

The time disorder'd, doth in common sense
Crowders and crush us to this monstrous form,
To hold our safety up. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

It seems probable, that the sea doth still grow narrower from age to age, and sinks more within its channel and the bowels of the earth, according as it can make its way into all those subterraneous cavities, and crowd the air out of them. Burnet, Theory.

As the mind itself is thought to take up no space, so its actions seem to require no time; but many of them seem to be crowded into an instant. Locke.

Then let us fill
This little interval, this pause of life,
With all the virtues we can crowd into it. Addison, Cato.

3. To incumber by multitudes.

How short is life! Why will vain courtiers toil,
And crowd a vainer monarch for a smile? Granville.

4. To Crowd Sail. [A sea phrase.] To spread wide the sails upon the yards.

To Crowd. v. n.

1. To swarm; to be numerous and confused.

They follow their undaunted king;
Crowd through their gates; and in the fields of light,
The shocking squadrons meet in mortal fight. Dryden, Virg.

2. To thrust among a multitude.

A mighty man, had not some cunning sin,
Amidst so many virtues, crowded in. Cowley, Davideis.

To Crowd.* v. n. [from crowd, the fiddle.] To fiddle.

Fiddlers, crowd on, crowd on; let no man lay a block in your way. Massinger, Old Law.

CROWDER.† n. s. [from crowd.] A fiddler.

Chevy-chase sung by a blind crowder,
Orpheus, a one-ey'd blearing Thracian, }
The crowder of that barbarous nation,
Was ballad-singer by vocation. Sidney.

Swift, ed. Barrct, p. 134.

CROWKEEPER. n. s. [crow and keep.] A scarecrow.

That fellow handles his bow like a crowkeeper. Shakspeare.

CROWN.† n. s. [Su. Goth. krona, a crown; Dutch, kroone; Fr. couronne; Lat. corona. Some refer to the Welsh cwrn, round.]

1. The ornament of the head which denotes imperial and regal dignity.

If thou be a king, where is thy crown? —

— My crown is in my heart, not on my head:

My crown is call'd content;

A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Look down, you gods,
And on this couple drop a blessed crown.

Shakspeare, Tempest.

I would the college of the cardinals

Would chuse him pope, and carry him to Rome,

And set the triple crown upon his head. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

C R O

Is it not as great a presumption in us to become God's sons; and to inherit kingdoms, and to hope for crowns, and thrones and sceptres, as it is to sit down with him as his guests? Kettlewell.

2. A garland.

Receive a crown for thy well-ordering of the feast. Eccles.

3. Reward; honorary distinction.

They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible. 1 Cor. ix. 25.

Let merit crown, and justice laurels give,
But let me happy by your pity live. Dryden, Epist.

4. Regal power; royalty.

The succession of a crown in several countries, places it on different heads. Locke.

5. The top of the head in a contemptuous sense.

If he awake
From toe to crown he'll fill our skins with pinches;
Make us strange stuff. Shakspeare, Tempest.

From the sole of his foot even to the crown of his head there was no blemish in him. 2 Sam. xiv. 25.

While his head was working upon this thought, the toy took him in the crown to send for the mongster. L'Estrange.

Behold! if fortune, or a mistress frowns,
Some plunge in business, others shave their crowns. Pope.

6. The top of any thing; as, of a mountain.

Upon the crown o' th' cliff, what thing was that Which parted from you? Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Huge trunks of trees, fell'd from the steep crown
Of the bare mountains, roll with ruin down. Dryden, Æn.

7. Part of the hat that covers the head.

I once opened a remarkable atheroma: it was about as big as the crown of a man's hat, and lay underneath the pectoral muscle. Sharp's Surg.

8. A piece of money, anciently stamped with a crown; five shillings.

Trust not to your servants, who may misinform you, by which they may perhaps gain a few crowns. Bacon.

But he that can eat beef, and feed on bread which is so brown,

May satisfy his appetite, and owe no man a crown. Suckling.

An ounce of silver, whether in pence, groats, or crown-pieces, stivers or ducatoons, or in bullion, is, and eternally will be, of equal value to any other ounce of silver. Locke.

9. Honour; ornament; decoration; excellence; dignity.

Much experience is the crown of old men. Eccles. xxv. 6.

Therefore my brethren, dearly beloved, and longed for, my joy and crown, stand fast in the Lord. Philip. iv. 1.

I thought to crush him in an equal force,
True sword to sword. Shakespeare, Coriol.

This act
Shall bruise the head of Satan, crush his strength, Defeating sin and death, his two main arms. Milton, P. L.

What can that man fear, who takes care to please a Being that is so able to crush all his adversaries? a being that can divert any misfortune from befalling him, or turn any such misfortune to his advantage? Addison, Guardian.

To CRUSH a Cup.† [this is the true expression, which Dr. Johnson without authority has given under "to crash;" and which Mr. Steevens has abundantly shewn to have been once common among low people. The same commentator observes, that in cant language we still say, "to crack a bottle."] To empty a cup; to drink together.

My master is the great rich Capulet; and if you be not of the house of Montagues, I pray, come and crush a cup of wine. Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

enveloped.

I have known the statue of an emperor quite hid under a crust of dross. Addison on Medals.

2. An incrustation; collection of matter into a hard body.

Were the river a confusion of never so many different bodies, if they had been all actually dissolved, they would at least have formed one continued crust; as we see the scorium of metals always gathers into a solid piece. Addison on Italy.

The viscous crust stops the entry of the chyle into the lacteals. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

The case of a pie made of meal, and baked.

He was never suffered to go abroad, for fear of catching cold: when he should have been hunting down a buck, he was by his mother's side, learning how to season it, or put it in crust. Addison, Spect.

CRUSTY.† adj. [from crust.]

1. Covered with a crust.

The wheat of Christ's Gospel once grew in Rome; but, it being cast into the river of contempt and neglect, sunk and settled in the bottom of oblivion, till with the mud and gravel of traditions and violent interpretations it increased to a huge heap; which, pressed softly by hypocrisy and pretences of devotion, made it as crusty as the hardness of heart or a scared conscience. Dr. Favon's Antiq. (1619,) p. 421.

There be two sorts: either the fluid, moist, succulent, tender, and soft parts of the body; or the dry, solid, tensile, hard, and crusty parts of the body.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age p. 173.

For sense cannot arrive to th' inwardness

Of things, nor penetrate the crusty fence

Of constricted matter close compress.

Mare, Song of the Soul, l. i. 28.

The egg itself deserves our notice: its parts within, and its crusty coat without, are admirably well fitted for the business of incubation. Derham, Physico-Theology.

2. Sturdy; morose; snappish: a low word.

Maister Ruf, are ye so crusty?

The astrologer, if his predictions come to pass, is cried up to the stars from whence he pretends to draw them. • South.

They slight the strongest arguments that can be brought for religion, and cry up very weak ones against it. Tillotson.

He may, but of interest, as well as conviction; cry up that for sacred, which if once trampled on and profaned, he himself cannot be safe, nor secure. • Locke.

Poets, like monarchs on an Eastern throne,

Confin'd by nothing but their will alone,

Here can cry up, and there as boldly blame

And, as they please, give infamy or fame. • Walsh.

Those who are fond of continuing the war, cry up our constant success at a most prodigious rate. Swift.

2. To raise the price by proclamation.

All the effort that I conceive was made by criing up the pieces of eight, was to bring in much more of that species, instead of others current here. Temple.

Cry. n. s. [cri, Fr.]

1. Lamentation: shriek; scream.

And all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, and there shall be a great cry throughout all the land. • Exodus.

2. Weeping; mourning.

3. Clamour: outcry.

Amazement seizes all; the general cry proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die. Dryden, Virg.

These narrow and selfish views have so great an influence in this cry, that there are several of my fellow freeholders who fancy the church in danger upon the rising of bank-stock. Addison.

4. Exclamation of triumph or wonder, or any other passion.

In popish countries some impostor cries out, a miracle! a miracle! to confirm the deluded vulgar in their errors; and so the cry goes round, without examining into the cheat. Swift.

5. Proclamation.

6. The hawkers proclamation of wares to be sold in the street: as, the cries of London.

7. Acclamation: popular favour.

The cry went once for thee,
And still it might, and yet it may again. Shakespeare.

8. Voice; utterance; manner of vocal expression.

Sounds also, besides the distinct cries of birds and beast, are modified by diversity of notes of different length, put together, which make that complex idea called tune. Locke.

9. Importunate call.

Pray not thou for this people, neither lift up cry nor prayer for them. Jeremiah, vii. 13.

10. Yelping of dogs.

He scorns the dog, resolves to try
The combat next; but if their cry
Invades again his trembling ear,
He strait resumes his wonted care. Waller.

11. Yell; inarticulate noise.

There shall be the noise of a cry from the fishgate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hill. Zeph. i. 10.

12. A pack of dogs.

You common cry of curs, whose breath I hate
As reek o' th' rotten fens; whose loves I prize
As the dead carcasses of unburied men,
That do corrupt my air. Shakespeare, Coriol.

About her middle round,
A cry of hell-hounds never ceasing bark'd. Milton, P. L.

CRYAL. n. s. The heron. Ainsworth.

CRYER. See CRIFER.

CRY'ER. n. s. A kind of hawk called the falcon gentle, an enemy to pigeons, and very swift. Ainsworth.

*CRY'ING. n. s. [from cry.] Importunate call, or outcry; shout; clamour; exclamation.

Vorification is syngynge, redynge, or cryinge.

Sir T. Eliot, Castell of Health, ch. 35. p. 90. l.
There is a cryng for wine in the streets; all joy is darkened. Isaiah, xxiv. 11.

He scorneth the multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the cryng of the driver. Job, xxxix. 7.

These troubles are nothing unto his mighty cryngs, who was compassed about for our sakes with fears and horrors, till his sweat was as drops of blood.

Deering on the Hebrews, ch. 5.

*CRYPT. n. s. [Fr. crypte; Lat. crypta; from the Gr. κρύπτω, to hide. A word of no great age in our language; the Latin one continuing in use at the beginning of the last century. "[In] their subterranean cryptæ—they set a lamp." Greenhill's Art of Embalming, 1705. Remarks on crypts in churches occur in the Archaeologia, vol. viii.] A subterranean cell, or cave; more especially, under a church, for the interment of particular persons. Formerly, crypta signified a subterranean oratory or chapel; and also the grave of a martyr.

*CRYPTICAL. adj. [Lat. crypticus. See CRYPT.]

*CRYPTICK. } Hidden; secret; occult; private; unknown; not divulged.

The students of nature, conscious of her more cryptick ways of working, resolve many strange effects into the near efficiency of second causes. Glanville's Apology.

Speakers, whose chief business is to amuse or delight, do not confine themselves to any natural order, but in a cryptical or hidden method adapt every thing to their ends. Watts.

CRYPTICALLY. adv. [from cryptical.] Occultly; secretly: perhaps in the following example; the author might have written critically.

We take the word acid in a familiar sense, without cryptically distinguishing it from those sapers that are a kin to it. Boyle.

CRYPTO'GRAPHY. n. s. [κρύπτω and γράφω.]

1. The art of writing secret characters.

2. Secret characters: cyphers.

CRYPTO'LOGY. n. s. [κρύπτω and λόγος.] Enigmatical language.

*CRYPTO'GAMOUS. adj. See CRYPTOGAMY.

*CRYPTO'GAMY. n. s. [κρύπτω, to conceal, and γάμος, marriage. Lat. cryptogamia.] In botany, applied to a genus of plants whose fructification is concealed.

The picturesque dingle Nant-y-bi abounds with what the botanists name the cryptogamous plants. The idea of cryptogamy inspired Timans with ideas of loves of other kind; and he makes our Nant the tender scene of courtship for all the nymphs and swains of Whiteford parish, which he candidly admits does always terminate in honest matrimony in the parish church.

Pennant, Hist. of Whiteford and Holywell, 1796.

*CRYSTAL. n. s. [Sax. crystal, Gr. κρύσταλλος.]

1. Crystals are hard, pellucid, and naturally colourless bodies, of regularly angular figures, composed of simple, not filamentous plates, not flexible or elastick, giving fire with steel, not fermenting with acid menstrua, and calcining in a strong fire. There are many various species of it produced in different parts of the globe. Hill on Fossils.

Island crystal is a genuine spar, of an extremely pure, clear, and fine texture, seldom either blemished with flaws or spots, or stained with any other colour. A remarkable property of this body, which has much employed the writers on opticks, is its double refraction; so that if it be laid over a black line, drawn on paper, two lines appear in the place of one. Hill.

Water, as it seems, turneth into crystal; as is seen in divers caves, where the crystal hangs in stillicidiis. Bacon.

If crystal be a stone, it is not immediately conerected by the efficacy of cold, but rather by a mineral spirit. Brown.

Crystal is certainly known, and distinguished by the degree of its diaphaneity and of its refraction, as also of its hardness, which are ever the same. Woodward.

3. Crystal is also used, for a factitious body cast in the glass houses, called also crystal glass, which is carried to a degree of perfection beyond the common glass; though it comes far short of the whiteness and vivacity of the natural crystal. Chambers.

3. Crystals [in chymistry] express salts or other matters shot or congealed in manner of crystal. Chambers.

If the menstruum be overcharged, within a short time the metals will shoot into certain crystals. Bacon.

CRYSTALL. adj.

1. Consisting of crystal.

Then, Jupiter, thou king of gods,

Thy crystal window ope, look out. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

2. Bright; clear; transparent; lucid; pellucid.

In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds

By crystal streams, that murmur through the meads. Dryden.

CRYSTALLINE. adj. [crystallinus, Lat.] It is to be observed, that Shakspeare places the accent on the first syllable of this word; and Milton, on the second; but Milton does not always write the word crystallin, as an eminent critick has asserted, either in the passage cited by him from Paradise Lost or that from Samson Agonistes. The poet's own editions there read crystalline; but elsewhere, unintentionally perhaps, crystallin.]

1. Consisting of crystal.

Mount eagle to my palace crystalline.

We provided ourselves with some small receivers, blown of crystalline glass. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

2. Bright; clear; pellucid; transparent.

The clarifying of water is an experiment tending to the health; besides the pleasure of the eye, when water is crystalline. It is effected by casting in and placing pebbles at the head of the current, that the water may strain through them.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

He on the wings of cherub rode sublime
On the crystalline sky, in saphir thron'd
Illustrious far and wide.

Milton, P. L.

CRYSTALLINE Humour. n. s. The second humour of the eye, that lies immediately next to the aqueous behind the uvea, opposite to the papilla, nearer to the forepart than the backpart of the globe. It is the least of the humours, but much more solid than any of them. Its figure, which is convex on both sides, resembles two unequal segments of spheres, of which the most convex is on its backside, which makes a small cavity in the glassy humour in which it lies. It is covered with a fine coat called aranea.

The parts of the eye are made convex, and especially the crystalline humour, which is of a lenticular figure, convex on both sides. Ray on the Creation.

CRYSTALLIZATION. n. s. [from crystallize.]

1. Congelation into crystals.

Such a combination of saline particles as resembles the form of a crystal, variously modified, according to the nature and texture of the salts. The method is by dissolving any saline body in water, and filtering it, to evaporate, till a film appear at the top, and then let it stand to shoot; and this it does, by that attractive force which is in all bodies, and particularly, in salt by reason of its solidity: whereby, when the menstruum or fluid, in which such particles flow, is salted enough or evaporated, so that the saline particles are within each other's attractive powers, they draw one another more than they are drawn by the fluid, then will they run into crystals. And this is peculiar to those, that let them be ever so much divided and reduced into minute particles, yet when they are formed into crystals, they each of them reassume their proper shapes; so that one might as easily divest them of their saltiness, as of their figure. This being an immutable and perpetual law, by knowing the figure of the crystals, we may understand what the texture of the particles ought to be, which can form those crystals; and, on the other hand, by knowing the texture of the particles, may be determined the figure of the crystals.

Quincy.

2. The mass formed by congelation or concretion.

All natural metallick and mineral crystallizations were effected by the water, which first brought the particles, whereof each consists, out from amongst the matter of the strata.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To CRYSTALLIZE. v. a. [from crystal.] To cause to congeal or concrete in crystals.

If you dissolve copper in aqua fortis, or spirit of nitre, you may, by crystallizing the solution, obtain a goodly blue. Boyle.

To CRYSTALLIZE. v. n. To coagulate; congeal; concrete; or shoot into crystals.

Recent urine will crystallize by inspissation, and afford a salt neither acid nor alkaline. Asbuthnot on Aliments.

CUB. n. s. [of uncertain etymology.]

1. The young of a beast; generally of a bear or fox.

I would outstare the sternest eyes that look,

Pluck the young sucking cubs from the she-bear. Shakspeare.

This night, wherein the cub-drawn bear would couch,

The lion, and the belly pinched wolf,

Keep their fur dry. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

In the eagle's destroying one fox's cubs, there's power executed with oppression. D'Estrange.

2. The young of a whale, perhaps of any viviparous fish.

Two mighty whales, which swelling seas had tost,

One as a mountain vast, and with her came

A cub, not much inferior to his dame.

Waller.

3. In reproach or contempt, a young boy or girl.

O thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be,

When time hath sow'd a grizzle on thy case?

Or will not else thy craft so quickly grow,

That thine own trip shall be thine overthrow? Shakspeare.

O most comical sight! a country squire, with the equipage of a wife and two daughters, came to Mr. Snipwel's shop last night; but, such two unlicked cubs!

Congreve.

CUB.* n. s. [perhaps from the Lat. cubo, to lie down; or a corruption of coop.] A stall for cattle; it is still so used in Gloucestershire.

The anchors also, and charter-mouks, vowed they not to die in their houses? And why are they not turned out of their cubbs, if vows may not be broken?

Confutation of N. Shaxton, (1546.) H. vi. b.

To CUB. v. a. [from the noun.] To bring forth: used of brasts, or of a woman in contempt.

Cubb'd in a cabin, on a mattress laid,

On a brown George with lousy swabbers fed;

Dead wine, that stinks of the borachio, sup

From a foul jack, or greasy maple cup.

Dryden, Persa.

To CUB.* v. a. [perhaps from coop.] To shut up; to confine as in a cub.

To be cubbed up on a sudden, how shall he be perplexed what shall become of him. Gurtp, Anat. of Medel. p. 153.

CUBATION. n. s. [cubatio, Lat.] The act of lying down. Diet.

CUBATORY. adj. [from cubo, Lat.] Recumbent. Diet.

CUBATURE. n. s. [from cube.] The finding exactly the solid content of any proposed body. Harris.

CUBE. n. s. [from κῦβος, a die.]

1. [In geometry.] A regular solid body, consisting of six square and equal faces or sides, and the angles all right, and therefore equal. Chambers.

2. [In arithmetick.] See CUBICK Number.

All the master planets move about the sun at several distances, as their common centre, and with different velocities. This common law being observed in all of them, that the squares of the times of the revolutions are proportional to the cubes of their distances. Green, Cosmol.

CUBE Root. n. s. The origin of a cubick number;

CUBICK Root. n. s. or a number, by whose multiplication into itself, and again into the product, any given number is formed: thus two is the cube-root, of eight. Chambers.

CUBEB. n. s. A small dried fruit resembling pepper, but somewhat longer, of a greyish-brown colour on the surface. It has an aromatiek smell, and is acrid to the taste. *Cubeb*s are brought from Java. Hill.

Aromatieks, as *cubeb*s, cinnamon, and nutmegs, are usually put into crude poor wines, to give them more oily spirits. Floyer on the Humours.

CUBICAL. adj. [from cube.]

CUBICK. adj. [from cube.]

1. Having the form or properties of a cube.

A close vessel, containing ten cubical feet of air, will not suffer a wax-candle of an ounce to burn in it above an hour before it be suffocated. Wilkins, Math. Mag.

It is above a hundred to one, against any particular throw, that you do not cast any given set of faces with four cubical dice: because there are so many several combinations of the six faces of four dice. Bentley's Sermon.

2. It is applied to numbers.

The number of four, multiplied into itself, produceth the square number of sixteen; and that again multiplied by four, produceth the cubick number of sixty-four. If we should suppose a multitude actually infinite, there must be infinite roots, and square and cubick numbers; yet, of necessity, the root is but the fourth part of the square, and the sixteenth part of the cubick number. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

The number of ten hath been as highly extolled, as containing even, odd, long and plain, quadrate and cubical numbers. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CUBICALLY.* adv. [from cubical.] In a cubical method.

Such is sixty-four, either made by multiplying eight into eight, and so it is a square; or else by multiplying four cubically. More, Conject. Cubi. p. 217.

CUBICALNESS. n. s. [from cubical.] The state or quality of being cubical.

CUBICULAR.* adj. [old Fr. cubulaire, "belonging to the bedchamber," Cotgrave; "cubinaire, valet de chambre," Lacombe.] Belonging to the chamber.

Being the inseparable cubicular companion the king took comfort in, in the height of his troubles. Howell, Lett. iv. 16.

CUBICULARY.* adj. [Lat. cubicularis, Fr. cubulaire, from cubiculum.] Fitted for the posture of lying down.

Custom, by degrees, changed their cubiculary beds into dis-cubitory, and introduced a fashion to go from the baths unto these. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CUBIFORM. adj. [from cube and form.] Of the shape of a cube.

CUBIT. n. s. [from cubitus, Lat.] A measure in use among the ancients; which was originally the distance from the elbow, bending inwards to the extremity of the middle finger. This measure is the fourth part of a well proportioned man's stature. Some fix the Hebrew cubit at twenty inches and a half, Paris measure; and others at eighteen. Cubit.

From the tip of the elbow to the end of the long finger, is half a yard and a quarter of the stature, and makes a cubit; the first measure we read of, the ark of Noah being framed and measured by cubits. Hollar on Time.

Measur'd by cubit, length, and breadth, and height. Mil-ton.

The Jews used two sorts of cubits; the sacred, and the profane or common one. Abelnot on Measures.

When on the goddess first I cast my sight,
Scarce seem'd her stature of a cubit height. Pope.

CUBITAL.* adj. [cubital, old Fr. cubitalis, Latin.] Containing only the length of a cubit.

The watchmen of Tyre might well be called pygmies, the towers of that city being so high, that, unto men below, they appeared in a cubital stature. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CUBITED.* adj. [from cubit.] Having the measure of a cubit.

The twelve cubited man, as Jacobus a Voragine measur'd his length; or the twelve-footed man, as he is measured by Petrus de Natalibus! Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 303.

CUCKINGSTOOL.* n. s. [derived by Hickeys from coquina, anciently cockanna, signifying an idle jade, a base woman. But it seems nearly allied to the Teut. hucke, a sort of pillory. It is sometimes called a ducking-stool; because the scold, after having been placed in the chair or stool fixed at the end of a long pole, was immersed in some muddy or stinking pool. The Saxon, (for it is of great antiquity,) called it scolding-stole. Brewers and bakers, transgressing against the laws, were also formerly thus punished. Our Homilies notice the punishment as inflicted on the unquiet.] An engine invented for the punishment of scolds and unquiet women, which, in ancient times, was called tumbrel. Coxcl.

In all well-ordered cities, common brawlers and scolders be punished with a notable kind of pain; as to be set on the ducking-stool, pillory, or such like.

Homilies, B. i. Against Contention.

We'll ship them out in duck-stools, there they'll sail
As brave Columbus did. Brown, and El. Lamer Tamed.

These mounted on a chair-curule,

Which moderns call a ducking-stool,

March proudly to the river's side. Hutchins.

CUCKOLD.* n. s. [Dr. Johnson derives this word from the Fr. cocu, which has been given to the cuckold in allusion to the cuckoo bird. The old French is cour, "mari dont la femme est infidelle." Lacombe. But as Howell, in his Letters, nearly two centuries since observed, "In French, cocu is taken for one whose wife is light, and hath made him a passive cuckold; whereas clean contrary, cocu, which is the cuckoo, doth use to lay her eggs in another bird's nest." Lett. iv. 19. Serenius refers our word to a northern origin; the Icelandick quomkall, signifying the same; and which he derives from quama, a woman, and kala, to blemish. Chaucer has given a bantering etymology of the word, which there is no occasion to cite.

Mr. Horne Tooké considers it formed from the Italian cuculo, the cuckoo; which is from the Lat. cuculus. That the husbands of false women wear horns, is an old saying, and common in other countries. And Dr. Burn, in his History of Westmoreland, would trace this crest of cuckoldom, to horns worn as crests by those who went to the crusades, as their armorial distinctions; to the infidelity of consorts during their absence; and to the finger of scorn pointing at them, on their return, crested indeed, but abused.] One that is married to an adulteress; one whose wife is false to his bed.

But for all the whole world; why, who would not make her husband a cuckold, to make him a monarch? I should venture purgatory for't. Shakespeare, Othello.

There have been,
Or I am much deceiv'd, cuckolds ere now;
And many a man there is, ev'n at this present,
Now while I speak this, holds his wife by th' arm,
That little thinks she has been sluic'd in's absence. Shakespeare.

For though the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
Of lands, to her the cuckold may succeed. Dryden, Juv.

Ever since the reign of King Charles II. the adultera is made a cuckold, the deluded virgin is debauched, and adultery and fornication are committed behind the scenes. Swift.

To CUCKOLD.† v. a. [from the Ital. cuculo, the cuckoo; as Mr. H. Tooke thinks, that is, to serve as the cuckoo serves other birds. Our verb has been sometimes written without the d, and is sometimes pronounced without it. But Beaumont and Fletcher are those only whom I have found to support it.]

1. To corrupt a man's wife; to bring upon a man the reproach of having an adulterous wife; to rob a man of his wife's fidelity.

If thou canst cuckold him, thou do'st thyself a pleasure, and me a sport. Shakespeare, Othello.

2. To wrong a husband by unchastity.

But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam,
Nor strut in streets with amazonian pace;
For that's to cuckold thee before thy face. Dryden, Juv.

CUCKOLDLY. adj. [from cuckold.] Having the qualities of a cuckold; poor; mean; cowardly; sneaking.

Poor cuckoldly knave, I know him not: yet I wrong him to call him poor; they say the jealous knave hath masses of money. Shakespeare, M. Wives of Windsor.

CUCKOLDMAKER. n. s. [cuckold and make.] One that makes a practice of corrupting wives.

If I spared any that had a head to hit, either young or old, he or she, cuckold or cuckoldmaker, let me never hope to see a chine again. Shakespeare, Hen. VIII.

One Hernando, cuckoldmaker of this city, contrived to steal her away. Dryden, Span. Friar.

CUCKOLDOM. n. s. [from cuckold.]

1. The act of adultery.

She is thinking on nothing but her colonel, and conspiring cuckoldom against me. Dryden, Span. Friar.

2. The state of a cuckold.

It is a true saying, that the last man of the parish that knows of his cuckoldom, is himself. Arbutnot, John Bull.

CUCKOO.† n. s. [Welsh, cuccre, guccre; Fr. coucou, cocu; German, guguck; Dan. kuckuck; Ital. cuculo; Lat. cuculus; Gr. κοκκυξ.]

1. A bird which appears in the Spring; and is said to suck the eggs of other birds, and lay her own to be hatched in their place; from which practice, it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling cuckoo, which, by mistake, was in time applied to the husband. This bird is remarkable for the uniformity of his note, from which his name in most tongues seems to have been formed.

Finding Mopsa, like a cuckoo by a nightingale, alone with Pamela, I came in. Sidney.

The merry cuckoo, messenger of Spring,
His trumpet shrill hath thrice already sounded. Spenser.

The plainsong cuckoo gray,
Whose note full many a man doth mark,
And dares not answer, nay. Shakespeare.

Take heed, have open eye; for thieves do foot by night:
Take heed ere Summer comes, or cuckoo birds affright. Shakespeare.

I deduce,
From the first note the hollow cuckoo sings,
The symphony of Spring; and touch a theme
Unknown to fame, the passion of the grove. Thomson

2. It is a name of contempt.

Why, what a rascal art thou then, to praise him so for running? — —A ho-seback, ye cuckoo; — but a-foot, he will not budge a foot. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

CUCKOO-BUD. } n. s. [cardaminus, Lat.]. The CUCKOO-FLOWER. } name of a flower.

When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows much bedight. Shakespeare.

Nettles, cuckoo-flowers,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds. Shakespeare, K. Lear.

CUCKOO-SPITTLE. n. s. [cuckoo and spittle.]

Cuckoo-spittle, or woodseare, is that spumous dew or exudation, or both, found upon plants, especially about the joints of lavender and rosemary; observable with us about the latter end of May. Brown, Fug. Err.

CU'QUEAN.* n. s. [Fr. coquine.] A vile woman; a prostitute.

Now [he] her, hourly, her own cuequean makes. B. Jonson.

CU'ULLATE. } adj. [cucullatus, hooded, Lat.].

1. Hooded; covered, as with a hood or cowl.
2. Having the resemblance or shape of a hood.

They are differently cucullated, and capuched upon the head and back. Brown, Fug. Err.

CU'CUMBER.† n. s. [cucumner, German; coucombre, old Fr. cucumis, Lat.]. The name of a plant, and also of the fruit of that plant.

It hath a flower consisting of one single leaf, bell-shaped, and expanded toward the top, and cut into many segments; of which some are male, or barren, having no embryo, but only a large style in the middle, charged with the farina: others are female, or fruitful, being fastened to an embryo, which is afterwards changed into a fleshy fruit, for the most part oblong and turbinate, which is divided into three or four cells, inclosing many oblong seeds. The species are, 1. The common cucumber. 2. The white cucumber. 3. The long Turkey cucumber. Miller.

How cucumbers along the surface creep,
With crooked bodies and with bellies deep. Dryden, Virg.

CUCURBITACEOUS. adj. [from cucurbita, Lat. a gourd.].

Cucurbitaceous plants are those which resemble a gourd; such as the pumpkin and melon.

Chambers.

C U D

CUCURBITE. n. s. [cucurbita, Latin.] A chymical vessel, commonly called a body, made of earth or glass, in the shape of a gourd, and therefore called cucurbita. Quincy.

I have, for curiosity's sake, distilled quicksilver in a cucurbita, fitted with a capacious glass-head. Boyle on Colours.
Let common yellow sulphur be put into a cucurbita glass, upon which pour the strongest aqua fortis. Mortimer.

CUCURBITIVE.* adj. [from cucurbita.] Applied to small flat worms of the shape of the seed of a gourd. Hist. R. S. iv. 138.

CUD. † n. s. [cud, Saxon. That which is cheered.] That food which is repositied in the first stomach in order to rumination, or to be chewed again.

Many times, when my master's cattle came hither to chew their cud in this fresh place, I might see the young bull testify his love. Sidney.

You range the pathless wood,
While on a flow'ry bank he chews the cud. Dryden.

CUDDEN. † n. s. [without etymology, Dr. Johnson says. Serenius refers it to the Icel. kudde, a dwarf. But I conceive it may more easily be derived from the Teut. kudde, a herd of cattle, and also a pig.] A clown; a stupid rustick; a low dolt; a low bad word.

The slavering cudde, propp'd upon his staff,
Stood ready gaping with a grinning laugh. Dryden.

To CUDGLE. † v. n. [a low word, I believe, without etymology, Dr. Johnson says. But it may be from the Welsh cuddio, to hide, to get out of sight. To cuddle, in the north of England, is to huddle.]

1. To be close; to squat.

Have you mark'd a partridge quake,
Viewing the tow'ring falcon nigh?
She cuddles low behind the brake;
Nor would she stay, nor dares she fly. Prior.

2. [from the Teut. kudden perhaps, to meet, to come together.] To join in an embrace.

CUDDY.* n. s. A fish which frequents the coasts of Scotland; the cole-fish.

The cuddy is a fish, of which I know not the philosophical name. It is not much bigger than a gudgeon, but it is of great use in these islands, as it affords the lower people both food and oil for their lamps. Johnson, Journey to the Western Isles.

CUDGEL. † n. s. [kudse, Dutch. Dr. Johnson says. The Scotch use the word cud for a strong staff, which Dr. Jamieson refers to the same original. Cudgel-play, as it is an imitation of the sword-exercise, leads one to suppose an affinity between our cudgel and the Spanish cuchillo; “a cuchilladas, by cuts, by slashes.” Minsheu, Span. Dict. The guard of the Spanish sword resembles also, in some degree, the basket-hilt of our rustick cudgels.]

1. A stick to strike with, lighter than a club, shorter than a pole.

Vine twigs, while they are green, are brittle; yet the wood, dried, is extreme tough; and was used by the captains of armies, amongst the Romans, for their cudgels. Bacon.

All we have seen compar'd to his experience
Has been but cudgel-play or cock-fighting.

Do not provoke the rage of stones
And cudgels to thy hide and bones.
Tremble and vanish. Hudibras.

The ass was quickly given to understand, with a good cudgel, the difference betwixt the one playfellow and the other. L'Estrange.

C U E

His early officer ne'er fail'd to crach
His knotty cudgel on his tougher back. Dryden, Juv.

This, if well reflected on, would make people more wary in the use of the rod and the cudgel. Locke.

The wise Cornelius was convinced, that these, being polemical arts, could no more be learned alone than fencing or cudgel-playing. Asbathnot and Pope.

2. To cross the CUDGELS, is to forbear the contest, from the practice of cudgel-players to lay one over the other.

It is much better to give way than it would be to contend at first, and then either to cross the cudgels, or to be baffled in the conclusion. L'Estrange.

To CU'DGEL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To beat with a stick.

My lord, he speaks most vilely of you, like a foul-mouth'd man, as he is: and said he would cudgel you. Shakespeare, Hen. IV.

The ass courting his master, just as the spaniel had done, instead of being stroked and made much of, is only rated off and cudgelled for all his courtship. South.

Three duels he fought, thrice ventur'd his life;
Went home, and was cudgell'd again by his wife. Swift.

2. To beat in general.

Cudgel thy brains no more about it: for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating. Shakespeare, Hamlet.

A good woman happened to pass by as a company of young fellows were cudgelling a walnut-tree, and asked them what they did that for. L'Estrange.

CU'DGEL-PLAY.* See CUDGEL.

CU'DGEL-PROOF. adj. Able to resist a stick.

His doublet was of sturdy buff,
And though not sword, yet cudgel-proof. Hudibras.

CU'DGELLER.* n. s. [from cudgel.] One who cudgels another.

They were often liable to a night-walking cudgeller, or the emptying of an urinal. Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

CU'DLE. n. s. A small sea-fish.

Of round fish there are but sprat, cudles, eels. Carver.

CU'DWLED. † n. s. [from cud and weed.] A plant. Miller.

There is a plant, which our herbalists call “herbim impium,” or wicked cudweed, whose younger branches still yield flowers to overtop the elder. Bp. Hall, Rem. of Proverbs, ii. § 9.

CU'E. † n. s. [old Fr. coxe, a tail; “coxe, coxe, pour queue, cauda, 960.” Lacombe.]

1. The tail or end of any thing; as, the long curl of a wig.

2. The last words of a speech which the player who is to answer catches, and regards as intimation to begin. See ALLOQUY.

Pyrrhus, you begin: when you have spoken your speech, enter into that brake; and so every one according to his cue. Shakespeare, Mids. N. Dream.

3. A hint; an intimation; a short direction.

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her? What would he do,
Had he the motive and the cue for passion
That I have? He would drown the stage with tears. Shakespeare.

Let him know how many servants there are, of both sexes, who expect vails; and give them their cue to attend in two lines, as he leaves the house. Swift.

4. The part which any man is to play in his turn.

Hold your hands,
Both you of my inclining, and the rest:
Were it my cue to fight, I should have known it Without a prompter. Shakespeare, Othello.

Neither is Otto here a much more taking gentleman: nothing appears in his cue to move pity, or any way make the audience of his party. Rymer, Tragedies of the last Age.

5. Humour; temper of mind: low word.

6. A farthing, or a farthing's worth. [merely the sound of q, as an abbreviation of the Lat. quadrans, a farthing.] Obsolete.

You are tain
To size your belly out with shoulder fees,
With rumps, and kidneys, and eues of single beer.
Beaumont and Fl. Will at several Weapons.

And trust me, 'twill not live eue so soon
To see an ape, a monkey, or baboon,
Play his for'd tricks; as I would give a tester,
To come and view them and their apish gesture.
Wither's Satires, 1611.

CUF KPO. † n. s. [Spanish. Our expression is often corruptly written quorpo, which see.] To be in cuirasse, is to be without the upper coat or cloak, so as to discover the true shape of the cuirpo or body.

Expos'd cuirpo to their rage,
Without my arms and equipage. Hudibras.

CUFF. † n. s. [zuffa, a battle; zuffare, to fight, Italian. This is Dr. Johnson's etymology. Skinner derives the word from the Gr. κόπρω, and Junius from κόπρω. But I've noticed the Danish kiep, a club, which, with our word, he refers to the Goth. kampfian, to strike with the hands. Serenius makes the same reference.]

1. A blow with the fist; a box; a stroke.

The priest let fall the book;
And as he stoop'd again to take it up,
The mad-brain'd bridegroom took him such a cuff,
That down fell priest and book, and book and priest.

There was no money bid for argument, unless the poet and the player went to cuff; in the question. Shakspeare.

He gave her a cuff on the ear, and she would prick him with her knitting-needle. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

Their own sects, which now lie dormant, would be soon at cuffing in with each other about power and preferment. Swift.

2. Any stroke or blow.

The billow, rude, rouz'd into hills of water,
Cuff'd after cuff, the earth's green banks did batter.
Mir. for Mag. p. 619.

Great Seyaer and stout Winter did so gall
With wounding cuff of cannon's fierce ball,
That on the Belgian coast, by friends forsaken,
They, with their captains, by their foes were taken.
Mir. for Mag. p. 834.

3. It is used of birds that fight with their talons.

CUFF. † n. s. [couff, French.] Part of the sleeve.
But here are no clothes;

Yes, here's a cuff. Beaumont and Fl. Little Thief.

To CUFF. v. n. [from the noun.] To fight; to scuffle.
Clapping forces acted by the court,
While the pious cuff to make the rabble sport. Dryden, Juv.

To CUFF. v. a.

1. To strike with the fist.

I'll after him again, and beat him? —
— Do, cuff him soundly, but never draw thy sword. Shakspeare.

Were not you, my friend, abused, and cuff'd, and kicked?
Congreve, Old Bachelor.

2. To strike with talons.

Those lazy owls, who, perch'd near fortune's top,
Sit only watchful with their heavy wings
To cuff down new-fledg'd virtues, that would rise
To nobler heights, and make the grove harmonious. Otway.

The dastard crow that to the wood made wing,
With her loud kaws her heaven kind does bring,
Who, safe in numbers, cuff the noble bird. Dryden.

They with their quills did all the hurt they cou'd,
And cuff'd the tender chickens from their food. Dryden.

3. To strike with the wings. This seems improper.

How'ring about the coast, they make their moan,
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own. Dryden, Æn.

He railed at fops; and, instead of the common fashion, he would visit his mistress in a morning-gown, band, short cuffs, and a peaked beard. Arbuthnot.

CUI BONO. * [a Latin expression often used in modern times, and, as it appears, adopted more than two centuries since.] For what purpose; to what end.

For, what of all this? what good? cui bono?

Bp. Andrews, Sermon, when Deceit of Westminster 1604, sign. E. i. b.

CUISSAGE. † n. s. The making up of twine into such forms, as it is commonly framed into, for carriage to other places. Covel.

CUIRASS. † n. s. [cuirasse, Fr. from cuir, leather; cuiracia, Ital.] A breastplate.

Ten years of bitter nights and heavy marches,
When many a frozen storm sing through my cuirass,
And made it doubtful whether that or I
Were the more stubborn metal. Beaumont and Fl. Bonduca.

The lance pursu'd the voice without delay,
And pierc'd his cuirass, with such fury sent,
And sign'd his bosom with a purple dint. Dryden.

CUIRASSIER. † n. s. [from cuirass.] A man at arms, a soldier in armour.

The field all iron cast a gleaming brow,
Nor wanted clouds of foot, nor on each horn
Cuirassiers, all in steel, for standing fight. Milton.

The picture of St. George, wherein he is described like a cuirassier, or horseman completely armed, is rather a symbolical image than any proper figure. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CUISSÉ. † n. s. [cuisse, French, the thigh. Perhaps our word should be written cuisse. Steevens has adopted cuisse, in his edition of Shakspeare. From cuisse the word has, in old authors, been converted also into cuss and cusche.] The armour that covers the thighs,

I saw young Harry with his beaver on,
His cuisse on his thighs, gallantly arm'd,
Rise from the ground like feather'd Mercury. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

The crosslet some, and some the cuisse mould,
With silver plated, and with ductile gold. Dryden, Æn.

But what had our author to wound Æneas with at so critical a time? And how came the cuisse to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour? Dryden.

CULDEES. † n. s. [colidei, Lat. They had the name, which we give them, in old French. "Culdees, moins, ceux qui sont consacrés au culte de Dieu." Lacombe. Dr. Jamieson, who has written a very learned and curious treatise on these persons, offers several other etymologies of the word.] Monks in Scotland and Ireland.

CULERAGE. † n. s. The same plant with ARSMAR. Ainsworth.

CULINARY. † adj. [culina, Latin.] Relating to the kitchen; relating to the art of cookery.

Great weight may condense those vapours and exhalations, as soon as they shall at any time begin to ascend from the sun, and make them presently fall back again into him, and by that action increase his heat; much after the manner that, in our earth, the air increases the heat of a culinary fire. Newton.

To those, who, by reason of their northern exposition, will be still forced to be at the expence of culinary fires, it will reduce the price of their manufacture. Arbuthnot.

To CULL. † v. a. [cueillir, French.] To select from others; to pick out of many.

The best of every thing they had, being cull'd out for themselves, if there were in their flocks any poor disensed thing not worth the keeping, they thought it good enough for the altar of God. Hooker.

Our engines shall be bent
Against the brows of this resisting town:
Call for our chiefest men of discipline,
To cull the plots of best advantage. Shakspeare, K. John.

Like the bee, culling from every flower,
Our thighs are packt with wax, our mouths with honey.
Shakespeare.

I do remember an apothecary
In tatter'd weeds, with overwhelming brows,
Culling of simples.
Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

Then in a moment fortune shall cull birth,
Out of one side, her happy minion.
Shakespeare, K. John.

The choicest of the British, the Roman, Saxon, and Norman laws, being culled, as it were, this grand charter was extracted.
Howell, Parli. of Beasts.

When false flowers of rhetorick thou would'st cull,
Trust nature, do not labour to be cull.
Dryden

For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls.
Dryden, Virg.

When the current pieces of the same denomination are of different weights, then the traders in money call out the heavier, and melt them down with profit.
Locke.

With humble duty and officious haste,
I'll call the farthest mead for thy repast.
Prior.

The various offerings of the world appear:
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,
And decks the goddess with the glittering spoil.
Pope.

CULLER. † n. s. [Fr. cueilleur.] One who picks or chooses.
Shenwood.

CULLIBILITY. * n. s. [from To cully.] Credulity; easiness of belief.

Providence never designed Gay to be above two and twenty,
by his thoughtlessness and cullibility.
Swift, Tell.

CULLION. † n. s. [coglione, a fool, Ital. or perhaps from scullion.] It seems to import meanness rather than folly. So far Dr. Johnson. Coglione is an Italian expression, denoting the highest personal contempt. So the old Fr. couille, "a lubberly coward." A scoundrel, a mean wretch.

Such a one as leaves a gentleman,
And makes a god of such a cullion.
Shakespeare, Tam. of the Shew.

Up to the brach, you dogs; avant, you cullions.
Shakespeare.

Their wives and loveliest daughters constuprated by every base cullion.
Barton, And. of Alc. p. 16.

CULLIONLY. adj. [from cullion.] Having the qualities of a cullion; mean; base.

I'll make a sop o' th' moonshine of you: you whorson, cullionly barber-monger, drive.
Shakespeare, M. Lear.

CULLIS. * n. s. [Fr. coulis.] Broth of boiled meat strained.
Cotgrave.

When I am excellent at cawdles,
And cullises, and have enough spare gold
To boil away, you shall be welcome to me.
Beaumont and Fl. The Captain.

Then by my cawdle and my cullis, I set
My daughter on her feet about the house here.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CULLUMBINE. n. s. [more properly spelt COLUMBINE.] The flowers of this plant are beautifully variegated with blue, purple, red, and white. Miller.

Her goodly bosom, like a strawberry bed;
Her neck, like to a bunch of cullumbines.
Spenser.

CULLY. n. s. [coglione, Ital. a fool.] A man deceived or imposed upon; as by sharpers or a strumpet.

Why should you, whose mother wits
Are furnish'd with all perquits,
Be allow'd to put all tricks upon
Our cully sex, and we use none.
Hudibras.

Yet the rich cullies may their boasting spare:
They purchase but sophisticated ware.
Dryden.

He takes it in mighty dudgeon, because I won't let him make me over by deed as his lawful cully.
Arbutnot.

TO CULLY. v. a. [from the noun.] To befool; to cheat; to trick; to deceive; to impose upon.

CULLYISM. * n. s. [from cully.] The state of a cully.

What is this but being a cully in the grave! Sure this is being henpecked with a vengeance! But without dwelling upon these less frequent instances of eminent cullism, what is there so common as to hear a fellow curse his fate that he cannot get rid of a passion to a jilt, and quote an half-line out of a miscellany poem to prove his weakness is natural!

Spectator, No. 486.

CULM. * n. s. [Welsh, cwlun.] A kind of dust coal found in pits with coals, and sometimes by itself: mixed up with clay in balls, it makes a strong fire, does not smoke, but emits a sulphurous smell. In this form, Mr. Bagshaw says, it is much used in some parts of Wales. The name is also known among our northern miners.

CULMEN. * n. s. [Lat.] Summit.

At the culmen or top was a chapel.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 227.

CULMIFEROUS. adj. [culmus and fero, Latin.]

Culmiferous plants are such as have a smooth jointed stalk, and usually hollow; and at each joint the stalk is wrapped about with single, narrow, long, sharp-pointed leaves, and their seeds are contained in chaffy husks.

There are also several sorts of grasses, both of the Cyprian and culmiferous kinds; some with broader, others with narrower leaves.
Woodward on Plants.

The properest food of the vegetable kingdom is taken from the farinaceous or mealy seeds of some culmiferous plants; as, oats, barley, wheat, rice, rye, maize, panic, millet, &c.

TO CULMINATE. † v. n. [culmen, Latin.] To be vertical; to be in the meridian.

Far and wide his eye command;
For sight no obstacle found here, or shade,

But all sun-shine, as when his beams at noon

Culminate from th' equator.
Milton, P. L.

When a star culminates, the first moment of his departure from the meridian is the first step to his declining.

Sir H. Sherer, in Ed. Halley's Misc. p. 34.

The regal star, then culminating, was the sun.
Dryden, Luc. of the D. of Guis.

CULMINATION. † n. s. [from culminate.]

1. The transit of a planet through the meridian.
2. Top or crown.

We upbraid the end with the beginning, the harvest with the spring, and wonder how that which in its putting forth was a flower, should in its growth and culmination become a thistle.
Fairchild's Sermon, 1657, p. 429.

CULPABILITY. n. s. [from culpable.] Blamableness.

CULPABLE. adj. [culpatilis, Latin.]

1. Criminal.

Proceed no stricter 'gainst our uncle Gloucester,
Than from true evidence of good esteem,
He be approv'd in practice culpable.
Shakespeare, Hen. VI.

2. Guilty; with of.

Thes' being perhaps culpable of this crime, or favourer of their friends.
Spenser on Ireland.

3. Blamable: blameworthy.

The wisdom of God setteth before us in Scripture so many admirable patterns of virtue, and no one of them, without somewhat noted wherein they were culpable, to the end that to him alone it might always be acknowledged, Thou only art holy, Thou only art just.
Hooker.

All such ignorance is voluntary, and therefore culpable; for as much as it was in every man's power to have prevented it.
South.

CULPABLENESS. † n. s. [from culpable.] Blame; guilt.

All those who have known me, cannot be ignorant of my culpableness in those particulars.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648), p. 145.

CULPABLY. adv. [from culpable.] Blamably; criminally.

If we perform this duty pitifully and culpably, it is not to be expected we should communicate holily.
Ep. Taylor.

CULPRIT.† n. s. [about this word there is great dispute. It is used by the judge at criminal trials, who, when the prisoner declares himself not guilty, and puts himself upon his trial, answers; Culprit, God send thee a good deliverance. It is likely that it is a corruption of, Qu'il paroit, May it so appear, the wish of the judge being that the prisoner may be found innocent. So far Dr. Johnson. What he has ascribed to the judge, however, belongs to the clerk of arraigns. Barrington also, in his Observations on the Statutes, thinks that the French qu'il paroit, i. e. make it appear, may be the origin of our word; the criminal having answered to the charge that he is not guilty, being required to make his innocence appear. Blackstone refers it to two abbreviations; viz. to cul for culpable, which the clerk declares the prisoner to be; and to the Fr. prit, ready to prove him so. Others to cul for culpable, and to the Fr. prist, (from prendre, taken. Mr. Tyrwhitt considers it as a vulgar name for a prisoner, from the Fr. cul and prist; meaning one seized by the skirts, caught by the back. This countenance my remark on humbailiff, which see.] A man arraigned before his judge.

The knight appear'd, and silence they proclaim:

Then first the culprit answer'd to his name;

And, after forms of law, was last requir'd

To name the thing that woman most desir'd.

Dryden.

An author is in the condition of a culprit; the publick are his judges: by allowing too much, and condescending too far, he may injure his own cause; and by pleading and asserting too boldly, he may displease the court. Prior, Pref. to Solomon.

CULTER.† n. s. [cultor, Sax. cutter, Latin.] The iron of the plow perpendicular to the share. It is commonly written coulter.

Her fallow, fees

The darnel, hemlock, and rank fennitory,

Doth root upon; while that the cutter rusts,

That should deracinate such savagery. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CULTIVABLE.* adj. [from cultivate.] Capable of cultivation. This word has lately been adopted by our writers on agriculture.

To CULTIVATE. v. a. [cultiver, French.]

1. To forward or improve the product of the earth, by manual industry.

Those excellent seeds implanted in your birth, will, if cultivated, be most flourishing in production; and, as the soil is good, and no cost nor care wanting to improve it, we must entertain hopes of the richest harvest. Fellon on the Clasticks.

2. To improve; to meliorate.

Were we but less indulgent to our fancies,
And patience had to cultivate our thoughts,
Our muse would flourish.

Waller.

To make man mild and sociable to man,
To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline, and liberal arts,
Th' embellishments of life.

Addison, Cato.

CULTIVATION.† n. s. [from cultivate.]

1. The art or practice of improving soils, and forwarding or meliorating vegetables.

The state of cultivation among this rude people was so imperfect, that it was with difficulty they could afford subsistence to their new guests.

Robertson.

2. Improvement in general; promotion; melioration.

An innate light discovers the common notions of good and evil, which, by cultivation and improvement, may be advanced to higher and brighter discoveries.

South.

A foundation of good sense, and a cultivation of learning, are required to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing.

Dryden.

CULTIVATOR. n. s. [from cultivate.] One who improves, promotes, or meliorates; or endeavours to forward any vegetable product, or any thing else capable of improvement.

It has been lately complained of, by some cultivators of clover-grass, that from a great quantity of the seed not any grass springs up.

Boyle.

CULTURE.† n. s. [culture, old Fr. cultura, Latin.]

1. The act of cultivation; the act of tilling the ground; tillage.

Give us seed unto our heart, and culture to our understanding, that there may come fruit of it.

2 Esd. viii. 6.

These three last were slower than the ordinary wheat of itself, and this culture did rather retard than advance.

Bacon.

The plough was not invented till after the deluge; the earth requiring little or no care or culture, but yielding its increase freely, and without labour and toil.

Woodward.

Where grows? — Where grows it not? If vain our toil,

We ought to blame the culture, not the soil.

Fix'd to no spot is happiness sincere.

Pope.

They rose as vigorous as the sun;

Then to the culture of the willing glebe.

Thomson.

2. Art of improvement and melioration.

One might wear any passion out of a family by culture, as skilful gardeners blot a colour out of a tulip that hurts its beauty.

Taller.

To CULTURE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cultivate; to manure; to till. It is used by Thomson, but without authority; yet is frequent in modern poetry.

In countries cultur'd high,

In ornamented towns, where order reigns,

Free social life, and polish'd manners fair.

Thomson, Liberty, P. ii.

CULVER. n. s. [columba, Lat. culpeus, Sax.] A pigeon.

An old word.

Had he so done, he had him snatch'd away,

More light than culver in the falcon's fist.

Spenser.

Whence, borne on liquid wing,

The sounding culver shoots.

Thomson, Spring.

CULVERHOUSE.* n. s. [from culver and house.] A dovecot.

Yet was this poor culverhouse sorer shaken.

Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Sermon. (1587.) p. 279.

CULVERIN.† n. s. [Fr. coulverine, from coulvere, a snake; ordnance being ornamented with sculptured snakes. See BASILISK.] A species of ordnance; originally an hawk.

A whole cannon requires for every charge, forty pounds of powder, and a bullet of sixty-four pounds; a culverin, sixteen pounds of powder, and a bullet of nineteen pounds; a demi-culverin, nine pounds of powder, and a bullet of twelve pounds.

Wilkins, Math. Magick.

Here a well polish'd mall gives us the joy

To see our prince his matchless force employ:

No sooner has he touch'd the flying ball,

But 'tis already more than half the mall;

And such a fury from his arm 't has got,

As from a smoking culverin 'twere shot.

Waller.

CULVERKEY. n. s. A flower.

Looking down the meadows I could see a girl cropping culverkeys and cowslips, to make garlands.

Walton's Angler.

CULVERTAIL.* n. s. In carpentry, the same as dovetail, which see.

Bullokar.

CUMBENT.* adj. [from the Lat. cumbens.] Lying down.

Too cold the grassy mantle of the marl,

In stormy winter's long and dreary night,

For cumbent sheep.

Dyer's Fleece.

To CUMBER.† v. a. [kommeren, kombren, to disturb, Dutch. Our word was formerly accomber.

1. "Acombred, vexatus," Prompt. Parv. "Acom-brynge a tombrement, vexatio," Ibid.]

1. To embarrass; to entangle; to obstruct.

Why asks he, what avails him not in fight,
And would but cumber, and retard his flight,
In which his only excellence is plac'd
You give him death, that intercept his taste. Dryden, Fab.

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears,
Clog'd with his cloaths, and cumber'd with his years. Dryden.
The learning and mastery of a tongue, being uneasy and unpleasant enough in itself, should not be cumbered with any other difficulties, as is done in this way of proceeding. Locke.

2. To crowd or load with something useless.

Let it not cumber your better remembrance.

Shakspeare, Timon.

The multiplying variety of arguments, especially frivolous ones, is not only lost labour, but cumbers the memory to no purpose. Locke.

3. To involve in difficulties and dangers; to distress.

Domestick fury, and fierce civil strife,
Shall cumber all the parts of Italy. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

4. To busy; to distract with multiplicity of cares.

Martha was cumbered about much serving. Luke.

5. To be troublesome in any place.

Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? St. Luke, xiii. 7.

Doth the bramble cumber a garden? It makes the better hedge; where, if it chances to prick the owner, it will tear the thief. Grew, Cosmol.

CUMBER. n. s. [kumber, Dutch.] Vexation; burdensomeness; embarrassment; obstruction; hindrance;
disturbance; distress.

By the occasion thereof I was brought to as great cumber
and danger, as lightly any might escape. Sidney.

Thus fade thy helps, and thus thy cumbers spring.
Fairfax, Tass. ii. 73.

The greatest ships are least serviceable, go very deep in water, are of marvellous charge and fearful cumber. Raleigh.

CUMBERSOME. adj. [from cumber.]

1. Troublesome; vexatious.

Thinking it too early, as long as they had any day, to break off so pleasing a company, with going to perform a cumbersome obedience. Sidney.

2. Burdensome; embarrassing.

I was drawn in to write the first part by accident, and to write the second by some defects in the first: these are the cumbersome perquisites of authors. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Unwieldy; unmanageable.

Very long tubes are cumbersome, and scarce to be readily managed. Newton, Opt.

CUMBERSOMELY. adj. [from cumbersome.] In a troublesome manner; in a manner that produces hindrance and vexation. Sherwood.

CUMBERSOMENESS. n. s. [from cumbersome.] Encumbrance; hindrance; obstruction. Sherwood.

CUMBRANCE. n. s. [from cumber.] Burden; hindrance; impediment.

How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife? Deut. i. 12.

Extol not riches then, the toil of fools,
The wise man's cumbrance, if not snare; more apt
To slacken virtue, and abate her edge,
Than prompt her to do aught may merit praise.
Milton, P. R. ii. 454.

CUMBROUS. adj. [from cumber.]

1. Troublesome; vexatious; disturbing.

A cloud of cumbrous gnats do him molest;
All striving to infix their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest.
Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 23.

2. Oppressive; burdensome.

Henceforth I fly not death, nor would prolong Life much! Bent rather, how I may be quit, Fairest and easiest, of this cumbrous charge. Milton, P. L.

They rear'd him from the ground,
And from his cumbrous arms his limbs unbound;
Then lanc'd a vein. Dryden.

Possessor's load was grown so great,
He sunk beneath the cumb'rous weight. Swift.

3. Jumbled; obstructing each other.

Swift to their several quarters hasted then
The cumbrous elements, earth, flood, air, fire. Milton, P. L.

CUMBROUSLY. adv. [from cumbrous.] In a burdensome manner.

Capitals to every substantive are cumbrously intrusive upon the eye. Seward's Letters, i. 164.

CUMFREY. n. s. [consolida.] A medicinal plant.

CUMIN. n. s. [cymyn, Sax. cuminum, Latin.] A plant. Miller.

Rank-smelling rue, and cumin, good for eyes.

When a dove-house is empty, there is cumin seed used to purloin from the rest of the neighbours' Reaumur, and M. Fair Maid of the Inn.

To CUMULATE. v. a. [cumulo, Latin.] To heap together.

All the extremes of worth and beauty that were cumulated in Camila. Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iv. 6.

A man that beholds the mighty shoals of shells, bedded and cumulated heap upon heap, amongst earth, will scarcely conceive which way these could ever live. Woodward.

CUMULATION. n. s. [Lat. cumulatio.] The act of heaping together. Dict.

For cumulation, I must needs profess, I never liked it. And it supposes, of and in itself, an unnecessary delay of the first degree, or a needless haste of the second.

Abp. Laud, Hist. of his Ch. of Oxford, p. 17.

CUMULATIVE. adj. [old Fr. cumulatif, from the
Lat. cumulo.] Consisting of parts heaped together.

As for knowledge which man receiveth by teaching, it is cumulative. Bacon on Learning.

Among many cumulative treasons charged upon the late earl of Strafford. Hale, Hist. Pl. of the Cr. ch. 14.

To CUN. v. a. [Icel. kunna, Goth. kunnan, the parent of our cunning.]

1. To know; to learn perfectly. Burret.

2. In naval language, to cun a ship, is to direct her course.

CUNCTATION. n. s. [cunctatio, Latin.] Delay; procrastination; dilatoriness.

It is most certain, that the English made not their best improvements of these fortunate events; and that especially by two miserable errors, cunctation in prosecuting, and haste in departure. Hayward.

The swiftest animal, conjoined with a heavy body, implies that common moral, festina lente; and that celerity should always be tempered with cunctation. Brown.

CUNCTATOR. n. s. [Latin.] One given to delay;
a lingerer; an idler; a sluggard. Not in use.

Others, being unwilling to discourage such cunctators, always keep them up in good hope, that, if they are not yet called, they may yet, with the thief, be brought in at the last hour. Hammond on Fundamentals.

To CUND. v. a. [from konney, to know, Dutch.]
To give notice to: a provincial or obsolete word.

See CONDEERS.

They are directed by a balker or huer on the cliff, who, discerning the course of the pilchard, cundeth, as they call it, the master of each boat. Carcw, Survey of Cornwall.

CUNEAL. adj. [cuneus, Latin.] Relating to a wedge; having the form of a wedge.

CUNEATED. adj. [cuneus, Latin.] Made in form of a wedge.

CUNIFORM. adj. [from cuneus and forma, Lat.]
Having the form of a wedge.

CUNIFORM-BONES. n. s. The fourth, fifth, and sixth bones of the foot: thus called from their wedge-like shape, being large above and narrow below. Dict.

CUNNER. n. s. [lepas.] A kind of fish less than an oyster, that sticks close to the rocks. Ainsworth.

CUNNING. adj. [from the Goth. kunnan. See To CUN; connan, Sax. konnen, Dut. to know.]

1. Skillful; knowing; well instructed; learned.

Schoolmasters will I keep within my house,
Fit to instruct her youth. — To cunning men
I will be very kind, and liberal
To mine own children, in good bringing up. Shakspeare.
I do present you with a man of mine,
Cunning in music And the mathematicks,
To instruct her fully in those sciences. Shakspeare.
Wherein is he good, but to taste sack and drink it? Wherein cunning, but in craft? Wherein crafty, but in villainy?

Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Send me now therefore a man cunning to work in gold, and in silver, and that can skill to cut and to grave. 2 Chron.
When Pedro does the late command,
She guides the cunning artist's hand. Prior.

2. Performed with skill; artful.

And over them Arachne high did lift
Her cunning web, and spread her subtle net,
Enwrapped in foul smock, and cloud, more black than jet. Spenser.

And there beside of marble stone was built
An altar, carv'd with cunning imagery;
On which true Christians blood was often spilt,
And holy martyrs often done to die. Spenser.

Once put out thy light,
Thou cunning'st pattern of excell'ing nature,
I know not where is that Promethean heat
That can thy light relumine. Shakspeare, Othello.

3. Artfully deceitful; sly; designing; trickish; full of fetches and stratagems; subtle; crafty; subdolous.

These small wares and petty points of cunning are infinite, and it were a good deed to make a list of them; for nothing doth more hurt than that cunning men pass for wise. Bacon.

Men will leave truth and misery to such as love it; they are resolved to be cunning: let others run the hazard of being sincere. South.

4. Acted with subtilty.

The more he protested, the more his father thought he dissembled, accounting his integrity to be but a cunning face of falsehood. Sidney.

CUNNING. n. s. [cuninge, Saxon. This word is not often found in the plural number; but it is so used by Shakspeare, in the sense of skill, to which definition Dr. Johnson gives no example.]

1. Artifice; deceit; slyness; sleight; craft; subtilty; dissimulation; fraudulent dexterity.

What if I be not so much the poet, as even that miserable subject of his cunning, whereof you speak. Sidney.

We take cunning for a sinister or crooked wisdom; and certainly there is great difference between a cunning man and a wise man, not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability. Bacon.

Discourage cunning in a child; cunning is the ape of wisdom.
Locke.

2. Art; skill; knowledge.

If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. Palm cxxxvii. 5.

We'll make a solemn wager on your cunnings.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Notes. with many a winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out,
With wauton heed and giddy cunning. Milton, J. Allegro.

CUNNINGLY. adv. [from cunning.]

1. Artfully; slyly; subtly; by fraudulent contrivance; craftily.

Among other crimes of this nature, there was diligent enquiry made of such as had raised and dispersed a bruit and rumour, a little before the field fought, that the rebels had the day, and that the king's army was overthrown, and the king fled; whereby it was supposed, that many sycourts were cun- cunningly put off and kept back. Paeon, Hen. VII.

I must meet my danger, and destroy him first;
But cunningly and closely. Denham, Sophy.

When stock is high, they come between,
Making by second-hand their offers;
Then cunningly retire unseen,
With each a million in his coffers. Swift.

2. Skillfully.

A stately palace built of squared bricks,
Which cunningly was without mortar laid,
Whose walls were high, but nothing strong nor thick,
And golden soile fl over them dislaid,
That purest skye with brightness they dismaid. Spenser, F. Q. i. iv. 4.

And many bards, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely voices cunningly. Spenser, F. Q. i. v. 3.
They shoot wondrous cunningly. Milton, Hist. of Moscow, ch. 2.

CUNNINGMAN. n. s. [cunning and man.] A man who pretends to tell fortunes, or teach how to recover stolen goods.

One Flaccianus—being about to purchase a piece of ground, went to this diviner or cunningman, to see what he could tell him about it! M. Casaubon, of Credulity, &c. p. 148.

He sent him for a strong detachment
Of headle, constable, and watchmen,
To attack the cunningman, for plunder
Committed falsely on his lumber. Hudibras.

CUNNINGNESS. n. s. [from cunning.] Deceitfulness; slyness.

But mine is such a drench of balderdash,
Such a strange cyrled cunningness. Beaumont and Fl. Twine Tamed.

The doctor by this oversight, or cunningness rather, got a supply of money. Howell, Lett. iv. 2.

CUP. n. s. [cupp, Sax. cup, Welsh; kop, Dutch;
kupf, Iceland. kub and kubbe, Pers. كوب, Gr.
Kesychius.]

1. A small vessel to drink in.

Thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. Genesis, xl. 13.

Ye heav'nly pow'rs, that guard
The British isles, such dire evils remove,
Far from fair Albion; nor let civil broils
Ferment from social cups. Phillips.

2. The liquor contained in the cup; the draught.

Which when the vile enchanteress perceiv'd,
With cup thus charm'd, imparting she deceiv'd. Spenser.
All friends shall taste

The wages of their virtue, and all foes
The cups of their deservings. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

W't please your lordship, drink a cup of sack. Shakspeare.
They that never had the use
Of the grape's surprising juice,
To the first delicious cup
All their reason render up. Waller.

The best, the dearest fav'rite of the sky,
Must taste that cup; for man is born to die. Pope, Odys.

3. Social entertainment; merry bout; [in the plural.]

Then shall our names,
Familiar in their mouth as household words,
Be in their flowing cups freshly remember'd. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Let us suppose that I were reasoning, as one friend with another, by the fireside, or in our cups, without care, without any great affection to either party. Knolles.

C U P .

It was near a miracle to see an old man silent, since talking is the disease of age; but amongst cups, makes fully a wonder.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Thence from cups, to civil broils!

Amidst his cups with fainting shivering seiz'd,

His limbs disjointed, and all o'er-joints'd,

His hand refuses to sustain the blow. Dryden, Persius.

4. Any thing hollow like a cup; as, the husk of an acorn, the bell of a flower.

A pyrites of the same colour and shape, placed in the cavity of another of an hemispherick figure, in much the same manner as an acorn in its cup. Woodward on Fossils.

5. Cup and Can. Familiar companions. The can is the large vessel, out of which the cup is filled, and to which it is a constant associate.

You boasting tell us where you din'd,

And how his lordship was so kind;

Swear he's a most facetious man;

That you and he are cup and can;

You travel with a heavy load,

And quite mistake pretermen's road. Swift.

6. [Cupper, French, to scarify.] A glass to draw the blood in scarification.

Hippocrates tells you, that in applying of cups, the scarification ought to be made with crooked instruments. Arbuthnot.

To CUP. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To supply with cups. This sense is obsolete.

Plump Bacchus, with pink eye,

In thy vat out cates he drown'd;

With thy grapes our hairs be crown'd!

Cup us, till the world go round. Shakespeare, Ant. and Cleop.

2. [Cupper, to cut, Fr.] To fix a glass-bell or cupper-site upon the skin, to draw the blood in scarification.

The clotted blood lies heavy on his heart,

Corrupts, and there remains in spite of art;

Nor breathing veins, nor cupping will prevail;

All outward remedies and inward fail. Dryden, Fob.

You have quartered all the foul language upon me, that could be raked out of the air of Billingsgate, without knowing who I am; or whether I deserve to be cupped and scarified at this rate. Spectator.

Blistering, cupping, and bleeding are seldom of use but to the idle and interperate. Addison, Spect.

Ifm the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd;

They bled, they cupped, they purg'd; in short they cur'd. Pope.

CUPBEARER. n. s.

1. An officer of the king's household.

There is conveyed to Mr. Villiers an intimation of the king's pleasure to wait and to be sworn his servant, and shortly after his cupbearer at large; and the Summer following he was admitted in ordinary. Wotton.

2. An attendant to give wine at a feast.

This vine was said to be given to Tros, the father of Priam, by Jupiter, as a recompence for his carrying away his son Ganymede to be his cupbearer. Broom.

CUPBOARD. n. s. [cup and board, a case or receptacle, Saxon.] A case with shelves, in which victuals or earthen ware is placed.

Some trees are best for planchers, as deal; some for tables, cupboards, and desks, as walnut. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Codrus had but one bed; so short to boot,

That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out:

His cupboard's head six earthen pitchers grac'd,

Beneath them was his trusty tankard plac'd. Dryden, Juv.

Yet their wine and their victuals these curmudgeon-lub-hards,

Lock up from my sight, in cellars and cupboards. Swift.

To CUPBOARD. v. a. [from the noun.] To treasure in a cupboard; to hoard up.

The belly did remain

P' th' midst o' th' body, idle and unactive,

Still cupboarding the viand, never bearing

Like labour with the rest. Shakespeare, Coriol.

C U P

CUBELLATION. * n. s. [from coppel, which is also written cupel. See COPPEL.] The process of assaying and purifying gold and silver.

From its [silver's] alloy with copper, iron, and antimony, it may be easily refined by cubellation with the necessary quantity of lead. Babington, System of Mineralogy, 1799.

CUPIDITY. * n. s. [cupiðitas, Latin, Dr. Johnson says. It may be from the French cupiditè; which, however, Menage thinks to be of no great age in that language. Corgrave has it. Our own word is old, and in the vocabularies of Bulokar and Cockeram; though Dr. Johnson has cited neither the authority of any dictionary, nor an example.]

Concupiscence; unlawful or unreasonable longing. Our wicked flesh; the fragile, and soft worldly things; all sorts of cupidities do hinder us to know the word of God.

Woodroffe's Fr. Grammar, (1623,) p. 216.

The serpent covertly winderth into your heart; first by blandishments he entangleth your reason, and then by fallacies he diverteth your fear, affirming you shall not surely die; and thus sharpeneth the curiosity, while he suggesteth the cupidity; and by these degrees presenteth the fruit, and putteth you out of the garden. II: Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 170.

CUPOLA. * n. s. [Italian, Dr. Johnson says. I may add the French cupole, because our own word was formerly written cupola. But the word is by some referred to the Gr. κύπελλον, a sort of cup; by others, to κύπελλον, sometimes written κύβαλον, a cymbal; both resembling, in their hollowness, a dome or cupola. Yet it is originally, perhaps, from the Arabick cubba or kubba, round; "Fifteen mosques express their bravery here, which in shape are round, after the alkaba, in Mecca." Sir T. Herbert's Trav. p. 129.] A dome; the hemispherical summit of a building.

The caravans-raw was very neatly built, adorned with cupolas at top. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 118.

Nature seems to have designed the head as the cupola to the most glorious of her work; and when we load it with super-numerary ornaments, we destroy the symmetry of the human figure. Addison, Spect.

CUPOLATED. * adj. [from cupola.] Having a cupola.

Opposite to this palace is a fair temple—cupolated, compassed with walls, and open to the air. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 163.

Now hast thou chang'd thee, Saint; and made Thyself a lane that's cupolated. Lovell, Luc. P. p. 16.

CUPPEL. n. s. See COPPEL.

There be other bodies fixed, as we see in the stuff whereof cuppel is made, which they put into furnaces, upon which fire worketh not. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CUPPER. n. s. [from cup.] One who applies cupping-glasses; a scarifier.

CUPPING-GLASS. * n. s. [from cup and glass. Fr. couper. See the 2d sense of To CUP.] A glass used by scarifiers to draw out the blood by rarefying the air.

I should rather substitute cupping-glasses, applied on the legs. Ferrand, Love Melancholy, p. 340.

The greatest mercy of the physician is to leave him with these cupping-glasses at the neck. Hammond's Works, iv. 487.

A bubo, in this case, ought to be drawn outward by cupping-glasses, and brought to suppuration. Wiseman.

CUPREOUS. adj. [cupreus, Latin.] Coppery; consisting of copper.

Having, by the intervention of a little sal armoniack, made copper inflammable, I took some small grains, and put them under the wick of a burning candle, whereby they were with the melted tallow so kindled, that the green, not blue, flame of the cupreous body did burn. Boyle.

CUPPROSE. * n. s. The poppy, so called in the north of England.

C U R

CUR.† n. s. [korre, Dutch, from the Goth. korhand. See CURTAIL.]

1. A worthless, degenerate dog.

'Tis a good dog.

— A cur, sir. —

— Sir, he's a good dog, and a fair dog.

Here's an old drudging cur turned off to shift for himself, for want of the very teeth and heels that he had lost in his master's service.

A cur may bear

The name of tiger, lion, or whatever
Denotes the noblest or the fairest beast.

Dryden, Jun.

2. A term of reproach for a man.

What would ye have, ye curs,

That like not peace nor war?

Shakespeare, Coriol.

This knight had occasion to inquire the way to St. Anne's lane; the person, whom he spoke to, called him a young popish cur, and asked him, who made Anne a saint.

Addison.

CURABLE. adj. [from cure.] That admits a remedy; that may be healed.

A consumption of the lungs, at the beginning, herein differs from all other curable diseases, that it is not to be worn away by change of diet, or a cheerful spirit.

Harvey.

A desperate wound must skilful hands employ,

But thine is curable by Philip's boy.

Dryden, Jun.

CURABLENESS. n. s. [from curable.] Possibility to be healed.

CURACY.† n. s. [from curate.]

1. Employment of a curate, distinct from a benefice; employment which a hired clergyman holds under the beneficiary.

They get into orders as soon as they can, and, if they be very fortunate, arrive in time to a curacy here in town.

Swift.

2. A benefice, distinguished by the name of a perpetual curacy; holden, not as a rectory or vicarage by institution and induction, but by licence from the bishop; who, having received the presentation to the curacy from the patron, (who is usually impropiator of the rectory to which the curacy is appendant, and which had formerly perhaps belonged to some religious house,) admits the curate into all the rights and privileges of the curacy. When these curacies have received an augmentation from the governors of the bounty of queen Anne, they are subject, in regard to voidance or cession, to the same rules as other benefices.

CURATE.† n. s. [curator, Latin.]

1. A clergyman hired to perform the duties of another.

He spar'd no pains; for curate he had none;
Nor durst he trust another with his care.

Dryden, Rab.

2. A parish priest.

Bishops and curates, and all congregations.

Comm. Prayer.

I thought the English of curate had been an ecclesiastical hireling. — No such matter; the proper import of the word signifies one who has the cure of souls.

Collier on Pride.

3. One who holds a perpetual curacy.

CURATESHIP.† n. s. [from curate.] The same with curacy.

Except he be shortly after to be admitted to some benefice or curateship then void.

Constitut. and Canons Eccl. 33.

CURATIVE. adj. [from cure.] Relating to the cure of diseases; not preservative.

The therapeutick or curative physick, we term that which restores the patient unto safety.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

There may be taken proper useful indications, both preservative and curative, from the qualities of the air.

Arbuthnot.

CURATOR.† n. s. [Latin.]

1. One that has the care and superintendence of any

C U R

The curators of Bedlam assure us that some lunaticks are persons of honour.

Swift.

2. A guardian appointed by law.

She was full five and twenty years old, at which age the civil law freeth from a curator.

Bacon, Collect. of V. Elib.

A minor cannot appear as a defendant in court, but by his guardian and curator.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

CURB. n. s. [cowber, to bend, French.]

1. A curb is an iron chain, made fast to the upper part of the branches of the bridle, in a hole called the eye, and running over the beard of the horse.

Farrier's Dict.

The ox hath his bow, the horse his curb, and the fawn his bells; so man hath his desire.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

So four fierce coursers, starting to the race,
Scow'r through the plain, and lengthen ev'ry pace;
Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatening cries they fear.

Dryden.

2. Restraint; inhibition; opposition; hindrance.

The Roman state, whose course will on

The way it takes, cracking ten thousand curbs

Of more strong links asunder, than can ever

Appear in your impediment.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

We remain

In strictest bondage, though thus far remov'd,

'Under th' inevitable curb, reserv'd

His captive multitude.

Milton, P. L.

By these men, religion, that should be

The curb, is made the spur to tyranny.

Denham, Sophy.

Even they who think us under no other tie to the true interest of our country, will allow this to be an effectual curb upon us.

Atterbury.

3. A curb is a hard and callous tumour, which runs along the inside of a horse's hoof; that is, on that part of the hoof that is opposite to the leg of the lame side.

Farrier's Dict.

TO CURB. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To guide or restrain a horse with a curb.

Part wield their arms, part curb the foaming steed.

Milton, P. L.

2. To restrain; to inhibit; to check; to confine; to hold back.

Were not the laws planted amongst them at the first, and had they not governors to curb and keep them still in awe and obedience?

Spencer on Ireland.

Then thou, the mother of so sweet a child,

Her false imagin'd loss cease to lament,

And wisely learn to curb thy sorrows wild.

Milton.

If sense and learning are such unsociable imperious things, he ought to keep down the growth of his reason, and curb his intellects.

Collier on Pride.

Knowing when a muse should be indulg'd

In her full flight, and when she should be curbed.

Roscommon.

At this she curb'd a groan, that else had come;

And pausing, view'd the present in the tomb.

Dryden, Fab.

'Till force returns, his ardour we restrain

And curb his warlike wish to cross the main.

Dryden.

Some poor cottage on the mountain's brow

Where pinching want must curb thy warm desires,

And household cares suppress thy genial fires.

Prior.

Nature to all things fix'd the limits fit,

And wisely curb'd proud man's pretending wit.

Pope.

3. Sometimes with from.

Yet you are curb'd from that enlargement by

The consequence of the crown.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

4. In the following passage it signifies, I think, as in Fr. to bend.

Though the course of the sun be curbed between the tropics, yet are not those parts directly subject to his perpendicular beam inhabitable or extremely hot.

Ray.

CURBING.* n. s. [from curb.] Check.

The mind that is warping to vice, should not think much to be kept upright by the curbings and the strokes of adversity.

Feltham, Rel. ii. 57.

CURD. n. s. [See CRUDLE.] The coagulation of milk; the concretion of the thicker parts of any liquor.

Milk of itself is such a compound of cream, curds, and whey, as it is easily turned and dissolved. Bacon.

This night, at least, with me forgo your care;

Chesnuts and curds, and creata shall be your fare. Dryden.

Let Sporus tremble—What! that thing of silk!

Sporus, that were white curd of ass's milk? Pope.

To CURD. v. a. [from the noun.] To turn to curds; to cause to coagulate.

Maiden, does it curd thy blood,

To say I am thy mother? Shakspeare, All's well.

It doth posset

And curd, like eager droppings into milk,

The thin and wholesome blood. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

The young men were friends,

As is the life and blood coagulate,

And curd'd in your body. Beaumont and Fl. Mad in the Mill.

This curd'd milk, this poor unletter'd whelp,

My body. Donne, Poems, p. 228.

To CURDLE. v. n. [from curd.] To coagulate; to shoot together; to congregate.

Powder of mint, and powder of red roses, keep the milk somewhat from turning or curdling in the stomach. Bacon.

Some to the house,

The fold and dairy, hungry bend their flight,

Sip round the pail, or taste the curdling cheese. Thomson, Summer.

To CURDLE. v. a. To cause to coagulate; to force into concretions.

His changed powers at first themselves not felt,

'Till curdled cold his courage gan't assail. Spenser.

Mixed with the sixth part of a spoonful of milk, it burnt to the space of one hundred pulse, and the milk was curdled. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

My soul is all the same,

Unmov'd with tear, and mov'd with martial fame;

But my churl blood is curdled in my veins,

And scarce the shadow of a man remains. Dryden, Virg.

Even now a fatal draft works out my soul;

Even now it curdles in my shrinking veins

The lazy blood, and freezes at my heart. Smith.

There is in life spirit of wine some acidity, by which brandy curdles milk. Floyer.

CURDY. adj. [from curd.] Coagulated; congealed; full of curds; curdled.

It differs from a vegetable emulsion, by coagulating into a curdy mass with acids. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CURE. v. n. [from curo, Latin.] Our word was formerly synonymous with care. "I take no cure," i. e. care, Chaucer. "Take cure of him," St. Luke, x. 35. Mathew's Version. In this sense, "cure of souls" is still applied to the charge or care committed to every clergyman at the institution of his benefice. The old French cure is also care.]

1. Remedy; restorative.

This league that we have made,

Will give her sadness very little cure,

Brother of England, how may we content

This widow lady? Shakspeare, K. John.

Cold, hunger, prisons, ills without a cure,

All these he must, and guiltless oft, endure. Dryden, Fab.

Now we're ador'd, and the next hour displease;

At first your cure, and after your disease. Graville.

Horace advises the Romans to seek a seat in some remote part, by way of a cure for the corruption of manners. Swift.

2. Act of healing.

I do cures to-day, and to-morrow.

St. Luke, xiii. 22.

3. The benefice or employment of a curate or clergyman.

Certain honourable persons, as well spiritual as temporal, shall have chaplains beneficed with cure to serve them in their honourable houses. Acts of Parl, 25 Hen. 8. ch. 16.

If his cure lies among the lawyers, let nothing be said against entangling property, spinning out causes, squeezing clients, and making the laws a greater grievance than those who break them. Collier.

To CURE. v. a. [curo, Latin.]

1. To heal; to restore to health; to remedy; to recover; with of before the disease. Used of patients or diseases.

The bones, in sharp colds, wax brittle; and therefore all contusions of bones, in hard weather, are more difficult to cure. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Here the poor lover, that has long endur'd

Some proud nymph's scorn, of his fond passion's cur'd, Wall'd

I never knew any man cured of mutton. Swift.

Hear what from love impractic'd hearts endure.

From love, the sole disease thou canst not cure. Pope.

2. To prepare in any manner, so as to be preserved from corruption. [Fr. cures, to pickle. Cotgrave.]

The beef would be so ill chosen, or so ill cured, as to stink many times before it came so far as Holland. Temple.

CURELESS. adj. [cure, and less.] Without cure; without remedy.

Bootless are plaints, and cureless are my wounds;

No way to fly, nor strength to hold out flight.

Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Repair thy wit, good youth, or it will fall

To cureless ruin. Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

If, said he,

Your grief alone is hard captivity,

For love of heav'n, with patience undergo

A cureless ill, since fate will have it so! Dryden, Fab.

CURER. n. s. [from cure.] A healer; a physician.

He is a curer of souls, and you a curer of bodies: if you should fight, you go against the hair of your professions. Shakspeare.

The indexterity and worse success of the most famous of our consumption cures, do evidently demonstrate their dimness in beholding its cures. Harcourt on Consumption.

CURFEW. n. s. [couvre feu, French.] Of earlier practice than William the Conqueror's time. It was an ancient custom among all the convents of the north, to put out their fire when a bell rung; and is mentioned in the Leges Burgorum sub Day. regis Scotie, c. 36. See Lord Lyttelton's Hist. of Hen. II. i. 490. And Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, i. 22. See also Lacombe in V. COUVREFEU. The old French word is cure-feu, or erre-feu, which comes nearer to our own. An evening-peal, by which the conqueror willed, that every man should rake up his fire, and put out his light; so that in many places at this day, where a bell is customarily rung towards bed time, it is said to ring curfew. Cowley.

You, whose pasture

Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice

To hear the solemn curfew. Shakspeare, Tempest.

Oh on a plat of rising ground,

I hear the far off curfew sound,

Over some vast water'd shore,

Swingin' slow with mullen roar.

Milton, Il. Pens.

2. A cover for a fire; a fireplate.

But now for pans, pots, curfews, counters and the like, the beauty will not be so much respected, so as the compound stuff is like to pass. Bacon.

CURIALITY. n. s. [from curialis, Latin.] The privileges, prerogatives, or perhaps retinue of a court.

The court and curiality.

Bacon to Villiers.

CURIOSITY. n. s. [Fr. curiosité. Cotgrave.]

1. Inquisitiveness; inclination to enquiry.

First granting, as I do, it was a weakness

In me, but incident to all our sex,

CUR

Curiosity, inquisitive, importune
Of secrets.

Milton, S. A. 775.

2. Nicety; delicacy.

When thou wast in thy gilt, and thy perfume, they mockt thee for too much curiosity; in thy rags thou knowest none, but art despised for the contrary.

Shakspeare, Timon.

3. Accuracy; exactness.

Qualities are so weighed, that curiosity in neither can make choice of either's moiety.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Our senses, however armed or assisted, are too gross to discern the curiosity of the workmanship of nature.

Ray.

4. An act of curiosity; nice experiment.

There hath been practised also a curiosity, to set a tree upon the north-side of a wall, and, at a little height, to draw it through the wall, and spread it upon the south-side; conceiving that the root and lower part of the stock should enjoy the freshness of the shade, and the upper boughs and fruit, the comfort of the sun; but it sortd not.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

5. An object of curiosity; rarity.

We took a ramble together to see the curiosities of this great town.

Addison, Freeholder.

CURIO'SO.* n. s. [Ital.] A curious person, such as we now call a virtuoso.

Dr. J. Wilkins, warden of Wadham college, the greatest curioso of his time, invited him and some of the musicians to his lodgings, purposely to have a consort.

Life of A. Wood, p. 112.

CURIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. curios, curious, Roq. modern, curieux; Lat. curiosus.]

1. Inquisitive; desirous of information; addicted to enquiry.

Be not curious in unnecessary matters; for more things are shewn unto thee than men understand.

Eccles. iii. 23.

Even then to them the spirit of lies suggests,
That they were blind, because they saw not ill;
And breath'd into their uncorrupted breasts

A curious wish, which did corrupt their will.

Davies.

If any one too curious should enquire

After a victory which we disclaim;

Then let him know the Belgians did retire

Before the patron saint of injur'd Spain.

Dryden.

Reader if any curious stay

To ask my hated name,

Tell them, the grave that hides my clay

Conceals me from my shame.

Wesley.

2. Attentive to; diligent about: sometimes with after.

It is pity a gentleman so very curious after things that were elegant and beautiful, should not have been as curious as to their origin, their uses, and their natural history.

Woodward.

3. Sometimes with of.

Then thus a senior of the place replies,

Well read, and curious of antiquities.

Dryden, Fab.

4. Accurate; careful not to mistake.

Till Arianism had made it a matter of great sharpness and subtlety of wit to be a sound believing Christian, men were not curious what syllables or particles of speech they used.

Hooker.

We all should be curious and watchful against vanities.

Bp. Taylor, Life of Christ, i. § 2.

5. Difficult to please; solicitous of perfection; not negligent; full of care.

A temperate person is not curious of sauces and deliciousness; he thinks not much, and speaks, not often of meat and drink.

Taylor.

6. Exact; nice; subtle.

Both these senses embrace their objects at greater distance, with more variety, and with a more curious discrimination, than the other sense.

Holder.

7. Artful; not neglectful; nicely diligent.

A vaile obscur'd the sunshine of her eyes,
he rose within herself her sweetness closed;

Each ornament about her seemly lies,

By curious chance, or careless art, composed.

Fairfax.

CUR

8. Elegant; neat; laboured; finished.

Understanding to devise curious works, to work in gold.

Exodus.

9. Rigid; severe; rigorous.

For curious I cannot be with you

Signor Baptista, of whom I hear so well.

Shakspeare.

CURIOUSLY.† adv. [from curious.]

1. Inquisitively; attentively; studiously.

He looked very curiously upon himself, sometimes fetching a little skip, as if he said his strength had not yet forsaken him.

Sidney.

At first I thought there had been no light reflected from the water in that place; but observing it more curiously, I saw within it several smaller round spots, which appeared much blacker and darker than the rest.

Newton, Opticks.

2. Elegantly; neatly.

Nor is it the having of wheels and springs, though never so curiously wrought, and artificially set, but the winding of them up, that must give motion to the watch.

South.

3. Artfully; exactly.

My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.

Psaln cxxxix. 15.

4. Captiously.

CURIOUSNESS.* n. s. [from curious.]

1. Curiosity; inquisitiveness.

Shewood.

Ah! curiousness first cause of all our ill,

And yet the plague which most torments us still.

Sir W. Alexander's Hours, II. i. st. 62.

Thus curiousness to knowledge is the guide.

Sir W. Alexander's Hours, II. i. st. 62.

2. Exactness.

He pursues the rational purposes of his own art; that, to the excellence of the metal, he may also add the curiousness of the figure.

South, Serm. viii. 321.

3. Nicety.

There is that coolness, and curiousness in a verse, which speaks it greatly unsuitable to the vehemence and seriousness of the prophetick spirit.

Spencer, Vanity of Vulg. Prophecies, p. 53.

CURL. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A ringlet of hair.

She apparelled herself like a page, cutting off her hair, leaving nothing but the short curls to cover that noble head.

Sidney.

Just as in act he stood, in clouds enshrin'd

Her hand she fasten'd on his hair behind;

Then backward by his yellow curls she drew

To him, and him alone confess'd in view.

Dryden, Fab.

2. Undulation; wave; sinuosity; flexure.

Thus it happens, if the glass of the prism be free from veins, and their sides be accurately plain and well polished, without those numberless waves or curls, which usually arise from the sand holes.

Newton, Opticks.

To CURL.† v. a. [krullen, Dutch, cyprian, Sax. krille, Dan.]

1. To turn the hair in ringlets.

What hast thou been?—

—A serving man, proud in heart and mind, that curled my hair wore gloves in thy cap, served the lust of my mistress's heart, and did the act of darkness with her.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. To writhe; to twist.

I soon will find out the beds of snakes,
And with my youthful blood warm their cold flesh,

Letting them curl themselves about my limbs,

Than sleep one night with thee.

Beaumont, and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

3. To dress with curls.

If she first meet the curled Antony,

He'll make demand of her a kiss.

Shakspeare.

They, up the trees
Climbing, sat thicker than the maky locks

That curl'd Megara.

Milton, P. P.

To raise in waves, undulations, or sinuosities.

The visitation of the winds,
Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
Curling their monstrous heads. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Seas would be pools, without the brushing air.
To curl the waves. Dryden, Fab.

To CURL.† v. n.

1. To shrink into ringlets.

Those slender aerial bodies are separated and stretched out, which otherwise, by reason of their flexibility and weight, would flag or curl. Boyle.

2. To rise in undulations.

To every nobler portion of the town,
The curling billows roll their restless tide;
In parties now they struggle up and down,
As armies, unoppos'd, for prey divide. Dryden.
While curling smoaks from village tops are seen. Pope.

3. To twist itself.

Then round her slender waist he curl'd
And stamp'd an image of himself, a sov'reign of the world. Dryden, Fab.

4. To shrink back.

The very thinking it
Would make a citizen start! some polittick tradesman Curl'd with the caution of a constable. B. Jonson, Mortimer's Fall.

CURL-HEADED.* adj. Having the hair of the head curled. Hudoc.

CURLED-PATE.* adj. Having the hair curled. See CURL-HEADED.

Make curl'd pate ruffians bald.
Shakspeare, Timon of Athens.

CURLEW. n. s. [courlien, Fr. arquata, Lat.]

1. A kind of water-fowl, with a large beak of a grey colour, with red and black spots.

Among birds we reckon creysers, curlews and puffins. Carew.

2. A bird larger than a partridge, with longer legs. It runs very swiftly, and frequents the cornfields in Spain, in Sicily, and sometimes in France! Trevoux.

CURLINESS.* n. s. [from curl.] The state of anything curled. A modern word.

CURLING-IRONS.* n. s. [from curl and iron.] An invention to curl the hair with.

Finding that her literature was thrown away upon me, she bid me, with great vehemence, reach the curling-irons. Johnson, Idler, No. 46.

CURLINGLY.* adv. [from curling.] In a waving fashion or manner. Sherwood.

CURLY.* adj. Inclining to curl; falling into ringlets.

CURMU'DGEON.† n. s. [It is a vitious manner of pronouncing cœur méchant, Fr., Dr. Johnson says, which he received from an unknown correspondent. To this Mr. Nares subscribes. Dr. Ash has transferred this into his vocabulary, as if "an unknown correspondent" was the etymology; distinguishing cœur by the interpretation of unknown, and méchant by that of correspondent; which will always excite both in foreigners and natives a harmless smile! But, to be serious, I doubt the etymology given by Dr. Johnson's correspondent. The French cœur méchant means a bad heart, a malicious perverted mind; our curmudgeon signifies merely a miser, a griper, with some tincture of crossness. Nor is it in the usual manner of derivation from the French language to form a single word from a compound expression. Perhaps it is a derivation from the German curmede, a kind of vassalage in Germany, when the lord claimed, at the death of certain persons, such of their goods as he chose. Hence a German expression, curmedige güter, bona conductia. See Ludewig, Jura Feudorum Rom. Imp. et Germ. Princip. 1740, p. 509. And Du Cange in V. CURMEDIA. From claims of this kind might easily arise an application to him who made them, similar to that of miser or griper; and the custom might also suggest our word. It is of no great age in our lexicography, being first, I believe, in that edition of Phillips's dictionary, which appeared in 1706. Anthony Wood, in the Life of himself, under the year 1661, writes it cur-mudgin. "Though he used it not half, yet at the year's end he did, like a cur-mudgin, sell it, and put the money in his purse." Some may perhaps think the word allied to a snarling cur, connecting it with the Saxon mupenung, a complaint, a murmuring. But the German custom seems the more rational etymology.] An avaricious churlish fellow; a miser; a niggard; a churl; a griper.

And when he has it in his claws,
He'll not be hide-bound to the cause;
Nor shalt thou find him a curmudgeon,
If thou dispatch it without grudging. Hudibras.

A man's way of living is commended, because he will give any rate for it; and a man will give any rate rather than pass for a poor wretch, or a penurious curmudgeon. Locke.

CURMU'DGEONLY.* adj. [from curmudgeon.] Avaricious; covetous; churlish; niggardly.

In a country where he that killed a hog invited the neighbourhood, a curmudgeonly fellow advised with his companions how he might save the charge. L'Estrange.

CURRENT.† n. s. [ribes, Lat. Current is an equivocal word with us, taken either for the fruit of a shrub called in Latin ribes; or a small sort of grape, growing in Zaute. The name current is taken from Corinthus, whence it's likely this fruit was first brought to us. Ray, Diction. Trilingue, p. 12. n.]

1. The tree hath no prickles; the leaves are large: The flower consists of five leaves, placed in form of a rose: the ovary, which arises from the centre of the flower-cup, becomes a globular fruit, produced in bunches.

The barberry and current most escape,
Though her small clusters imitate the grape. Tate's Country.

2. A small dried grape; properly written corinth. They butter'd currants on fat veal bestow'd,
And rumps of beef with virgin honey stow'd;
Insipid taste, old friend, to them who Paris know,
Where rocombole, shallot, and the rank garlic grow. King

CURRENCY. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation; power of passing from hand to hand. The currency of those half-pence would, in the universal opinion of our people, be utterly destructive to this kingdom. Swift.

2. General reception: as, the report had a long currency.

3. Fluency; readiness of utterance; easiness of pronunciation.

4. Continuance; constant flow; uninterrupted course.

The currency of time to establish a custom, ought to be with a continuando from the beginning to the end of the term prescribed. Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. General esteem; the rate at which any thing is vulgarly valued.

He that thinketh Spain to be some great over-match for this estate, assisted as it is, and, may be, is no good mintman, but takes greatness of kingdoms according to their bulk and currency, and not after intrinsic value. Bacon.

6. The papers stamped in the English colonies by authority, and passing for money.

CU'RRENT. adj. [currrens, Lat.]

1. Circulatory; passing from hand to hand.

Shekels of silver, current money with the merchant.

Genesis, xxiii. 16.

That there was current money in Abraham's time is past doubt, though it is not sure that it was stamp'd; for he is said to be rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. Arbutnot.

2. Generally received; uncontradicted; authoritative.

Many strange bruits are received for current. Sidney.

Because such as openly reprove supposed disorders of state, are taken for principal friends to the common benefit of all, under this fair and plausible colour, whatsoever they utter passeth for good and current. Hooker.

I have collected the facts, with all possible impartiality, from the current histories of those times. Swift.

3. Common; general.

They have been trained up from their infancy in one set of notions, without ever hearing or knowing what other opinions are current among mankind. Watts.

About three months ago we had a current report of the king of France's death. Addison.

4. Popular; such as is established by vulgar estimation.

We are also to consider the difference between worth and merit, strictly taken; that is, a man's intrinsic; this, his current value; which is less or more, as men have occasion for him. Grew, Cosmol.

5. Fashionable; popular.

Off leaving what is natural and fit,
The current folly proves our ready wit;
And authors think their reputation safe,
Which lives as long as fools are pleas'd to laugh. Pope.

6. Passable; such as may be allowed or admitted.

Fouler than heart can think thee, thou canst make
No excuse current, but to hang thyself. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

7. What is now passing; what is at present in its course; as, the current year.CU'RRENT. n. s.

1. A running stream.

The current, that with gentle murmur glides,
Thou know'st, being stopp'd, impatiently doth rage;
But his fair course is not hindered;
He makes sweet music with th' enamel'd stones. Shakspeare.

These inequalities will vanish in one place, and presently appear in another, and seem perfectly to move like waves, succeeding and destroying one another; save that their motion oftentimes seems to be quickest, as if in that vast sea they were carried on by a current, or at least by a tide. Boyle.

Heav'n her Eridanus no more shall boast,
Whose fame in thine, like lesser current's lost;
Thy nobler streams shall visit Jove's abodes,
To shine among the stars, and bathe the gods. Dorhan.

Not fabled Po more swells the poet's lays,
While through the sky his shining current strays. Pope.

2. [In navigation.] Currents are certain progressive motions of the water of the sea in several places, either quite down to the bottom, or to a certain determinate depth; by which a ship may happen to be carried more swiftly or retarded in her course, according to the direction of the current, with of against the way of the ship. Harris.

3. Course; progression.

The castle of Cadmus was taken, and Thebes invested by Pheidias the Lacedemonian insidiously, which drew on a surprize of the castle, a recovery of the town, and a current of the war even into the walls of Sparta. Bacon.

CU'RRENTLY. adj. [from current.]

1. In a constant motion.

2. Without opposition.

The very cause which maketh the simple and ignorant to think they even see how the world of God runneth currently on your side, is, that their minds are forestalled, and their conceits perverted beforehand. Hooker, Preface.

3. Popularly; fashionably; genefally.

4. Without ceasing.

CU'RRENTNESS. n. s. [from current.]

1. Circulation.

2. General reception.

3. Easiness of pronunciation.

When substantialness combineth with delightfulness, and currentness with staydness, how can the language sound other than most full of sweetness? Camden, Remains.

CU'RRIE.* *n. s.*1. A course. [Lat. curriculum.]

Upon a currie in this world depends a long course of the next, and upon a narrow scene here an endless expansion hereafter. Brown, Christ. Mon. ii. 23.

2. A chariot. [Lat. curriculus; old Fr. curicule, un petit chariot. Lacombe.] In modern times the word has been adopted for an open chaise with two wheels drawn by two horses abreast.CU'RRIER.† n. s. [corrouer, old Fr. coriarius, Lat.]

One who dresses and pares leather for those who make shoes, or other things.

A currier bought a bearskin of a huntsman, and laid him down ready money for it. L'Estrange.

Warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found
To lodge their foathsome carrion under ground;
For useless to the currier were their hides,
Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides
Be free'd from filth. Dryden, Virg.

CU'RRIISH. adj. [from cur.] Having the qualities of a degenerate dog; brutal; sour; quarrelsome; malignant; churlish; uncivil; untractable; impracticable.

Sweet speaking oft a curriish heart reclaims. Sidney.

No care of justice, nor no rule of reason,
Did thenceforth ever enter in his mind,
But cruelty, the sign of curriish kind. Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

In fashions wayward, and in love unkind;
For Cupid deigns not wound a curriish mind. Fairfax.

I would she were in heaven, so she could Entreat some pow'r to change this curriish Jew. Shakspeare.

She says your dog was a cur; and tells you, curriish thanks is good enough for such a present. Shakspeare.

CU'RRIISHLY.* adv. [from curriish.] In a brutal or malignant manner.

Boner being restored againe,—curriishly, without all order of law or honesty,—wasted from them all the livings they had. Fore's Acts and Mon. Acc. of Ridley.

To use or deal curriishly with. Sherwood.

CU'RRIISHNESS.* n. s. [from curriish.] Moroseness; churlishness; malignity.

Diogenes, though he had wit, by his curriishness got the name of dog. Feltham, Res. ii. 69.

Hell's porter, Cerberus,
That curridness into our breasts dost put!

To CU'RRY.† v. a. [Fr. courroyer, from corium, leather, Lat.]

1. To dress leather, by beating and rubbing it.

1. To beat; to drub; to thrash; to chastise.
He hath well curried thy coat. Barrel, 1580.
I have seen him
Curry a fellow's carcass handsomely.

Beaumont and Fl. Island Princess.

- A deep design in't to divide
The well affected that confide;
By setting brother against brother,
To claw and curry one another. Hudibras.

I may expect her to take care of her family, and curry her hide in case of refusal. Addison, Spect.

3. To rub a horse with a scratching instrument, so as to smooth his coat, and promote his flesh.
Your short horse is soon curried.

Beaumont and Fl. Valentinian.

4. To scratch in kindness; to rub down with flattery;
to tickle.

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men; if to his men, I would curry with master Shallow.

Shakespeare.

5. To CURRY Favour. To become a favourite by petty officiousness, slight kindnesses, or flattery.
[This expression requires further illustration, than the preceding words of Dr. Johnson. The rubbing down a horse, is a process that conveys pleasure to the animal. So much for curry in the present instance; but favour is a corruption. The true word is favel, as Mr. Donce has abundantly shewn in his Illustr. of Shakspeare, i. 474. Thus, in the Merch. Tale of Beryn, in Urry's Chaucer, p. 597.
"As though he had lerned curry favel of some old serere." Now the name of favel, Mr. Donce observes, was anciently given to yellow-coloured horses, in like manner as bayard, blanchard, and lyard were to brown, white, or gray. One of Richard the First's horses, he adds, was so called.
Robert of Brunne's Chron. p. 175. He therefore rightly concludes, that to curry favel, or, as we now say, to curry favour, is a metaphorical expression adopted from the stable.]

He judged them still over-ajectly to fawn upon the heathens, and to curry favour with infidels. Hooker.

This humour succeeded so with the puppy, that an ass would go the same way to work to curry favour for himself.

L'Estrange.

CURRY.* n. s. A word imported from the East-Indies, denoting a mixture of various eatables, a very relishable composition. The leaves of the canthium parviflorum, one of the plants of the Coromandel coast, being much used in curries, that plant has also there the name of kura, which means esulent. See Plants of the Coromandel Coast, 1795.

CURRYCOMB. n. s. [from curry and comb.] An iron instrument used for currying or cleaning horses.

He has a clearer idea from a little print than from a long definition; and so he would have of strigil and sistrum; if, instead of a currycomb and cymbal, he could see stamped in the margin small pictures of these instruments. Locke.

CURRYING.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of rubbing down a horse.

Frictions make the parts more fleshy and full; as we see both in men, and in the currying of horses: the cause is, for that they draw a greater quantity of spirits and blood to the parts. Boehn.

To CURSE. v. a. [cuprian, Saxon.]

1. To wish evil to; to execrate; to devote.
Curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me. Numbers, xxxiii. 6.

After Sojman hau looked upon the dead body, and bitterly cursed the same, he caused a great weight to be tied unto it, and so cast into the sea. Rholles.

What, yet again! the third time hast thou cursed me;
This imprecation was for Laius' death,
And thou hast wished me like him. Dryden and Lee.

2. To mischief; to afflict; to torment.
On ignipious realms and barb'rous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse 'em with such sons as those. Pope.

To CURSE. v. n. To imprecate; to deny or affirm with imprecation of divine vengeance!

The silver about which thou cursedst, and speakest of also in my ears, behold the silver is with me. Jud. xvi. 2.

CURSE.* n. s. [Sax. cupp.]

1. Malediction; wish of evil to another.

Neither have I suffered my mouth to sin, by wishing a curse to his soul. Job.

I never went from your lordship but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing. Dryden.

2. Affliction; torment; vexation.

Curse on the stripling! how he apes his sire!
Ambitiously sententious! Addison, Cato.

CURSED. part. adj. [from curse.]

1. Deserving a curse; hateful; detestable; abominable; wicked.

Merciful pow'r's!
Restrain in me the cursed thoughts that nature
Gives way to in repose. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

2. Unholy; unsanctified; blasted by a curse.

Come lady, while heav'n lends us grace,
Let us fly this cursed place,
Lest the sorcerer us entice
With some other new device;
Not a waste or needless sound,
Till we come to holier ground. Milton, Comus.

3. Vexatious; troublesome.

This cursed quarrel be no more renew'd;
Be, as becomes a wife, obedient still;
Though griev'd, yet subject to her husband's will. Dryden.
One day, I think, in Paradise he liv'd;
Destin'd the next his journey to pursue,
Where wounding thorns and cursed thistles grew. Prior.

CURSEDLY. adv. [from cursed.] Miserably; shamefully; a low cant word.

Satisfaction and restitution lies so cursedly hard on the giz-zards of our publicans. L'Estrange.

Sure this is a nation that is cursedly afraid of being overrun with too much politeness, and cannot regain one great genius but at the expence of another. Pope.

CURSEDNESS. n. s. [from cursed.] The state of being under a curse.

CURSER.* n. s. [from curse.] One that utters curses or execrations.

All men, lovers of virtue, ought to hold him for a viper, and like a curser of father and mother.

Wodroephe's Fr. Gram. (1623.) p. 332.

The curse causeless: as, the pope's excommunications, and execrations, with bell, book, and candle. Such curcers are cursed; the curse will fall upon the curser's head.

Bp. Richardson on the O.T. (1655.) p. 298.

The curser's punishment should fight the curse.

Dryden, Rel. Laius.

CURSHIP. n. s. [from cur.] Dogship; meanness; scoundrelship.

How durst th', I say, oppose thy curship,
'Gainst arms, authority, and worship. Hudibras.

CURSING.* n. s. [Sax. cupring.] An execration;
a curse.

He read all the words of the law, the blessings and curings.

Isaiah, viii. 1.

Theodoret calls them execrations, curings, and reviling.
God. Abp. Laud.

CURSITOR. n. s. [Latin.] An officer or clerk belonging to the Chancery, that makes out original writs. They are called clerks of course, in the oath of the clerks of Chancery. Of these there are twenty-four in number, which have certain shires allotted to each of them, into which they make out such original writs as are required. They are a corporation among themselves. Cowel.

Then is the recognition and value, signed with the handwriting of that justice, carried by the curator in Chancery for that shire where those lands do lie, and by him is a writ of covenant thereupon drawn, and ingrossed in parchment. Bacon.

CURSORY. adj. [from cursum, Latin.] Cursory; hasty; careless. A word, I believe, only found in the following line.

I have but with a curatory eye
O'erglanc'd the articles. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CURSORYLY. adv. [from cursum.] Hastily; without care; without solicitous attention.

We are so far from slighting or contemning the Scripture, that we are the great admirers of it, and do endeavour to advance it above all other writings whatsoever, and that even in natural things, though never so accidentally, or cursorily handled. Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 254.

I shall speak cursorily of every thing but that which I had immediately from himself. Burnet, Life of Ed. Rochester.

This power, and no other, Luther disowns, as any one that views the place but cursorily must needs see. Atterbury.

CURSORYNESS. n. s. [from cursum.] Slight attention.

CURSORY. adj. [from cursum, Latin.]

1. Hasty; quick; inattentive; careless.

Some eminent instructive expressions of Holy Writ, which are not obvious to every cursum and superficial reader.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 266.

The first, upon a cursum and superficial view, appeared like the head of another man. Addison.

2. Going about; not stationary.

Father Cresswell, legier jesuit in Spain; father Baldwin, legier in Flaunders, as parsons at Rome; besides their cursum men, as Gerrard, &c.

Proceedings against Garnet, (1606.) sign. F.

CURST. adj. Froward; peevish; malignant; mischievous; malicious; snarling.

Mr. Mason, after his manner, was very merry with both parties, pleasantly playing both with the shrewd touches of many curst boys, and with the small discretion of many lewd schoolmasters. Ascham, Schoolmaster.

Curst cows have short horns.

Proverb.

I pray you, though you mock me, gentlemen,

Let her not hurt me: I was never curst;

I have no gift at all in shrewishness:

I am a right maid for my cowardice;

Let her not strike me.

Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dr.

I'll go see if the bear be gone from the gentleman, and how much he hath eaten: they are never curst but when they are hungry. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

Her only fault, and that is fault enough,

Is, that she is intolerably curst,

And shrewd and forward, so beyond all measure,

That, were my state far worse than it is,

I would not wed her for a mine of gold.

Shakspeare.

When I dissuaded him from his intent,

And found him pight to do it with curst speech,

I threaten'd to discover him.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

And though his mind

Be ne'er so curst, his tongue is kind.

Cromwell.

CURSTNESS. n. s. [from curst.] Peevishness; frowardness; malignity.

Then, noble partners,

Touch you the sourest points with sweetest terms,

Nor curstness grow to the matter. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Her mouth she with'd, her forehead taught to frown,

Her eyes to sparkle fires to love unknown;

Her sallow cheeks her envious mind did shew,
And every feature spoke aloud the curstness of a shrew.

Dryden

CURT. adj. [from curtus, Latin.] Short.

Such a latitude of years may hold a considerable corner in the general map of time; and a man may have a curt epitome of the whole course thereof in the days of his own life.

Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 22

Peck! His name is curt,

A monosyllable, but [he] commands the horse well.

B. Jonson, New Inv.

TO CURTAIL. v. a. [curto, Latin.] It was anciently written curtal, which perhaps is more proper; but dogs that had their tails cut, being called curtal dogs, the word was vulgarly conceived to mean originally to cut the tail, and was in time written according to that notion. So far Dr. Johnson. But the word is rather from the Fr. tailleur court, and is applicable, as the examples shew, to any deficiency. Nor was curtal, as applied to dogs, always formerly written as he states; but also in a manner which points out the etymology of curt, short, and tail. "The curt-tail'd fox, in the fable, endeavoured to have all foxes cut-tail'd." Junius, Sin Stigm. (1539.) p. 449.]

1. To cut off; to cut short; to shorten.

I, that am curtail'd of all fair proportion,

Deform'd, unfinish'd, sent before my time

Into this breathing world.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Then why should we ourselves abridge,

And curtail our own privilege?

Hudibras.

This general employ, and expence of their time, would assuredly curtail and retrench the ordinary means of knowledge and erudition, as it would shorten the opportunities of vice.

Woodward.

*Perhaps this humour of speaking no more than we must, has so miserably curtailed some of our words; and, in familiar writings and conversations, they often lose all but their first syllables. Addison, Spect.

2. It has of before the thing cut off.

The count assured the court, that Fact his antagonist had taken a wrong name, having curtailed it of three letters; for that his name was not Fact but Faction. Addison.

CURTAIL Dog. n. s. A dog lawed, or mutilated, according to the forest laws, whose tail is cut off, and who is therefore hindered in coursing. Perhaps this word may be the original of cur.

I, amazed, ran from her as a witch; and I think, if my breast had not been made of faith, and my heart of steel, she had transformed me to a curtail dog, and made me turn i' the wheel.

Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

CURTAILER.* n. s. [from curtail.] One who cuts off, or leaves out, any thing.

This conduct of theirs — served to shew that the Latins had not been interpolators of the Creed, but that the Greeks had been curtailers. Waterland, on the Athan. Cr. x. § 21.

CURTAILING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Abbreviation. Scribblers send us over their trash in prose and verse, with abominable curtailings, and quaint modernisms. Swift.

CURTAIN. n. s. [old Fr. courtine. V. Lacombe, vol. ii. in voce; Lat. cortina.] Our own word was sometimes anciently written cortine.]

1. A cloth contracted or expanded at pleasure, to admit or exclude the light; to conceal or discover any thing; to shade a bed; to darken a room.

Their curtains ought to be kept open, so as to renew the air. Arbuthnot on Diet.

So through white curtains shot a timorous ray,
And op'd those eyes that must eclipse the day.

Pope.

Thy hand, great Dulness! lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all.

Pope.

2. To draw the CURTAIN. To close it so as to shut out the light, or conceal the object.

I must draw a curtain before the work for a while, and keep your patience a little in suspense. Bornet's Theory.

- Once more I write to you, and this once will be the last: the curtain will soon be drawn between my friend and me, and nothing left but to wish you a long good night. Pope.

3. To open it so as to discern the object.

So soon as the all-cheering sun
Should in the farthest East begin to draw
The shady curtain from Aurora's bed.

Shakespeare, Rom. and Jul.

Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till this stormy night be gone;
And th' eternal morrow dawn,
Then the curtain will be drawn.

Crashaw.

4. [In fortification.] That part of the wall or rampart that lies between two bastions. Military Dict.

The governor, not discouraged, suddenly of timber and boards raised up a curtain twelve foot high, at the back of his soldiers.

Knollys.

- CURTAIN-LECTURE.* n. s. [from curtain and lecture.]

A reproof given by a wife to her husband in bed.

What endless brawls by wives are bred!
The curtain-lecture makes a mournful bed. Dryden, Juv.

She ought to exert the authority of the curtain-lecture, and if she finds him of a rebellious disposition, to tame him.

Addison.

- To CURTAIN.* v. a. [from the noun.] To inclose or accommodate with curtains.

Now o'er one half the world
Nature seems dead, and wicked dreams abuse
The curtain'd sleep.

Shakespeare, Much.

The wand'ring prince and Dido,
When with a happy storm they were surpris'd,
And curtain'd with a counsel-keeping cave.

Tit. Andron.

But in her temple's last recess inclos'd,
On Dulness' lap the anointed head repos'd:
Him close the curtain'd round with vapours blew,
And soft be sprinkled with cimmerian dew.

Pope.

- CURTAL. n. s. [Fr. comtauld.] A horse with a docked tail.

Colgrave.

Hold my stirrup, my one lacquey; and look to my curtal, the other. B. Jonson, Masques.

- CURTAL. adj. [from curt.] Brief, or abridged.

Matters of this moment, as they were not to be decided there by those divines, so neither are they to be determined here by essays and curtal aphorisms, but by solid proofs of Scripture.

Milton, Eiconoclastes.

- CURTATE Distance.* n. s. [In astronomy.] The distance of a planet's place from the sun, reduced to the ecliptick.

- CURTA'FROX.* n. s. [from curto, to shorten, Latin.] The interval between a planet's distance from the sun and the curtate distance.

Chambers.

- CURTELASSE.* } See CUTLASS.
CURTELAX. }

- CURTILAGE. n. s. [old Fr. curtillage, "petit jardin, cour d'une maison située à la campagne qui n'est point fermée de murs, mais de hayes." Lacombe. Low Lat. curtilagium, from cers, cortis.] A garden, yard, or field, or other piece of ground, lying near, or belonging to, a messuage.

Cowel.

- CURTLY. adv. [from curt.] Briefly.

Here Mr. Licentiat shew'd his art; and bath so curtly, succinctly, and concisely — epitomiz'd the long story of the captive.

Gayton, Notes on D. Quir. R. 15.

- CURTSY.* See COURTESY.

- CURVATED.* adj. [curvatus, Latin.] Bent; crooked.

- CURVATION. n. s. [curvo, Latin.] The act of bending or crooking.

As for his session, we must not look upon it as determining any posture of his body, corresponding to the curvation of our limbs.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 6.

- CURVATURE. n. s. [old Fr. curvatur.] Crookedness; inflexion; manner of bending.

It is bent after the manner of the catenarian curve, by which it obtains that curvature that is safest for the included narrow.

Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

Flaccid it was beyond the activity of the muscle, and curvature of the ossicles, to give it a due tension.

Holder.

- CURVE.* adj. [curvus, Latin.] Crooked; bent; inflected; not straight.

Unless an intrinsic principle of gravity or attraction, make it describe a curve line about the attracting body.

Bentley.

- CURVE.* n. s. Any thing bent; a flexure or crookedness of any particular form.

And as you lead it round, in careful curve,
With eye intente mark the springing game.

Thomson.

- To CURVE.* v. a. [curvo, Latin.] To bend; to crook; to inflect.

And the tongue is drawn back and curved.

Holder.

- To CURVET.* v. n. [curvare, Italian.]

1. To leap; to bound.

Cry, holla! to thy tongue! I pry thee: it curvets unseasonably.

Shakespeare, As you like it.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get.

So oft and high he did curvet,

Ere he himself could settle.

Dryden, Nymphal.

Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with fright,
The wounded steed curvets; and, rais'd upright,
Lights on his feet before: his hoofs behind
Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind.

Dryden, Æn.

2. To frisk; to be licentious.

- CURVET. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A leap; a bound.

The king — ran his curvets so openly, and made his turns and returns in the head of the army, that so fair a mark invited his enemies' arrows to hit him. Fidler, Holy War, p. 148.

2. A frolick; a prank.

- CURVIL'NEAR.* adj. [curvus and linea, Lat.]

1. Consisting of a crooked line.

The impulse continually draws the celestial body from it's rectilinear motion, and forces it into a curvilinear orbit; so that it must be repeated every minute of time.

Cheyne.

2. Composed of crooked lines.

- CURVITY.* n. s. [from curve.] Crookedness.

The joined ends of that bone and the incus receding, make a more acute angle at that joint, and give a greater curvity to the posture of the ossicles.

Holder in Speech.

- CURULE. adj. [Lat. curulis.] An epithet applied to the chair, in which the Roman magistrates had a right to sit: which our own poet, Butler, has playfully adopted, and also employed as signifying magisterial.

We that are wisely mounted higher
Than constables in curule wit.

Hudibras.

These mounted on a chair curule,

Which moderns call a cucking-stool.

Hudibras.

And Tully's curule chair, and Milton's golden lyre.

Akenside.

- CUSHION.* n. s. [kussen, Dutch; coussin, French.]

A pillow for the seat; a soft pad placed upon a chair.

Call Claudius, and some other of my men;
I'll have them sleep on cushions in my tent.

Shakespeare, J. Caesar.

If you are learn'd,
Be not as common fools; if you are not,
Let them have cushions by you.

Shakespeare, Coriol.

But ere they sat, officious Baucis lays
Two cushions stuff'd with straw, the seat to raise;
Conse, but the best she had.

Deidra, Fab.

An Eastern king put a judge to death for an iniquitous sentence; and ordered his hide to be stuffed into a cushion, and placed upon the tribunal, for the son to sit on.

Swift.

CUSHIONED. adj. [from cushion.] Seated on a cushion; supported by cushions.

Many, who are cushioned upon thrones, would have remained in obscurity.

Dissertation on Parties.

CUSHIONET. n. s. [Fr. coussinet.] A little cushion; that which resembles a small cushion.

Upon these pretty cushionets did lie

Ten thousand beauties, and as many smiles,

Chaste blandishments, and genuine courtesies.

Beaumont's Psyche, vi. 200.

Harris.

CUSPATED. adj. [from cuspis, Latin.] A word

CUSPIDATED. adj. expressing the leaves of a flower ending in a point.

Quincy.

CUSPIDAL. adj. [from the Lat. cuspidis.] Sharp; ending in a point.

This enters and riseth up into life and beauty the whole corporeal world, orders the lowest projection of life, viz. the real cuspidis of the cone infinitely multiplied, awaking that immense mist of atoms into several energies, into fiery, watery, and earthy; and, placing her magic attractive points, sucks hither and thither to every centre a due proportion, and rightly disposed number of these cuspidal particles.

More, Notes on Psych. p. 346.

TO CUSPIDATE. v. a. [from the Lat. cuspidare.] Dr. Johnson notices, with cuspidated, the adjective cuspidated; but knew not that the verb existed in our language.] To sharpen.

Cockeram.

CUSPIS. n. s. [Lat.] The sharp end of a thing. See CUSPIDAL.

The multiplied cuspidis of the cone is nothing but the last projection of life from Psyche. More, Notes on Psych. p. 425.

CUSTARD. n. s. [crestard, Welsh.] A kind of sweet-meal made by boiling eggs with milk and sugar till the whole thickens into a mass. It is a food much used in city feasts.

He cram'd them, till their guts did ache,

With caudle, custard, and plumb cake.

Hudibras.

Now may'r and shrieves all hush'd and satiate lay;

Yet eat, in dreams, the custard of the day.

Pope.

CUSTODIAL. adj. [from custody.] Relating to custody, or guardianship.

Ecclesia commendata, so called in contradistinction to ecclesia titulata, is that church, which for the custodial charges and government thereof, is by a revocable collation concredited with some ecclesiastical person, in the nature of a trustee.

Lett. to the Bp. of Rochester, (1772,) p. 2.

CUSTODY. n. s. [custodia, Latin.]

1. Imprisonment; restraint of liberty.

The council remonstrated unto queen Elizabeth the conspiracies against her life, and therefore they advised her, that she should go less abroad weakly attended; but the queen answered, she had rather be dead than put in custody.

Bacon.

For us enslav'd, is custody severe,

And stripes, and arbitrary punishment

Inflicted.

Milton, P. L.

2. Care; guardianship; charge.

Under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari, shall be the boards of the tabernacle.

Num. iii. 36.

We being strangers here, how dar'st thou trust

So great a charge from thine own custody.

Shakespeare.

An offence it were, rashly to depart out of the city committed to their custody.

Knolles.

There is generally but one coin stamp'd upon the occasion, which is made a present to the person who is celebrated on it: by this means the whole fame is in his own custody.

Addison.

3. Defence; preservation; security.

There was prepared a fleet of thirty ships for the custody of the narrow seas.

Bacon.

CUSTOM. n. s. [coutume, French.]

1. Habit; habitual practice.

Blood and destruction shall be so in use,
That mothers shall but smile, when they behold
Their infants quarter'd by the hands of war;
All pity choak'd with custom of fell deeds.

Shakespeare, Jul. Cas.

Custom, a greater power than nature, seldom fails to make them worship.

Locke.

2. Fashion; common way of acting.

And the priest's custom with the people was, that when any man offered sacrifice, the priest's servant came, while the flesh was in seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hands.

1 Samuel, ii.

3. Established manner.

According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord.

St. Luke, i.

4. Practice of buying of certain persons.

You say he is assiduous in his calling, and is he not grown rich by it? Let him have your custom, but not your votes.

Addison.

5. Application from buyers: as, this trader has good custom.

6. [In law.] A law or right, not written, which, being established by long use, and the consent of our ancestors, has been, and is, daily practised. We cannot say that this or that is a custom, except we can justify that it hath continued so one hundred years; yet, because that is hard to prove, it is enough for the proof of a custom, if two or more can depose that they heard their fathers say, that it was a custom all their time; and that their fathers heard their fathers also say, that it was likewise a custom in their time. If it is to be proved by record, the continuance of a hundred years will serve. Custom is either general or particular: general, that which is current through England; particular is that which belongs to this or that county; as gavelkind to Kent, or this or that lordship, city, or town. Custom differs from prescription; for custom is common to more, and prescription is particular to this or that man: prescription may be for a far shorter time than custom.

Cowel.

7. Tribute; tax paid for goods imported, or exported.

The residue of these ordinary finances be casual or uncertain, as be the escheats and forfeitures, the customs, butlerage, and imposts.

Bacon.

Those commodities may be dispersed, after having paid the customs, in England.

Temple.

Custom to steal is such a trivial thing,

That 'tis their charter to defraud their king.

Dryden.

Stabo tells you, that Britain bore heavy taxes, especially the customs on the importation of the Gallick trade.

Arbuthnot.

TO CUSTOM. v. a. [from the noun.] To pay the duty at the custom-house for goods exported or imported.

The ships are safe, riding in Malta road;

And all the merchants, with other merchandize,

Are safe arriv'd, and have sent me to know,

Whether yourself will come and custom them.

Marlow, Jew of Malta.

TO CUSTOM. v. u. To accustom, which see.

For on a bridge he custometh to fight.

Spenser, F. Q.

CUSTOM-HOUSE. n. s. The house where the taxes upon goods imported or exported are collected.

Some custom-house officers, birds of passage, and oppressive thrifty squires, are the only thriving people amongst us. Swift.
CUSTOMABLE. † adj. [old Fr. constamable.] Not a single example has hitherto been given of this useful word. Common; habitual; frequent.

Ye shall fynde it more at large declared in the christen exhortacyon unto customable swearers.

Bale, Yet a Course, &c. (1543) fol. 90. b.

Among the Greeks, by reason of their familiare and customable maner of speeche, one vocable serveth, &c.

Martin, Marr. of Priests, (1554) F. f. 4. b.

The customable shooting at home, specially at butts and pricks, makes nothing at all for strong shooting, which doth most good in war.

Ascham, Toxophilus.

Through the customable use thereof, this vice [adultery] is grown unto such a height, that in a manner among many it is counted no sinne at all.

Homilies, B. i. p. 78.

They use the customable adornings of the country.

Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 39.

CUSTOMABLENESS. n. s. [from customable.]

1. Frequency; habit.

2. Conformity to custom.

CUSTOMABLY. † adv. [from customable.] According to custom.

Works of darkness, not only because they are customably in darkness, &c.

Homilies, B. i. Against Idolatry.

Kingdoms have customably been carried away by right of succession, according to proximity of blood.

Hayward.

And because I observe that fear and dull disposition, lukewarmness, and sloth, are not seldomer wont to cloak themselves under the affected name of moderation, than true and lively zeal is customably disparaged with the term of indiscretion, bitterness, and choler.

Milton, Apology for Smeaton.

CUSTOMARILY. † adv. [from customary.] Habitually; commonly.

He underwent those previous pains, which customarily antecede that suffering.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. iv.

To call God to witness truth, or a lye perhaps, or to appeal to him on every trivial occasion, in common discourse, customarily without consideration, is one of the highest indignities and affronts that can be offered him.

Ray.

CUSTOMARINESS. n. s. [from customary.] Frequency; commonness; frequent occurrence.

A vice, which, for its guilt, may justify the sharpest, and for its customariness the frequentest invectives, which can be made against it.

Government of the Tongue.

CUSTOMARY. adj. [from custom.]

1. Conformable to established custom; according to prescription.

Pray you now, if it may stand with the tune of your voices, that I may be consul: I have here the customary gown.

Shakspeare.

Several ingenious persons, whose assistance might be conducive to the advance of real and useful knowledge, lay under the prejudices of education and customary belief.

Glanville, Serpents.

2. Habitual.

We should avoid the profane and irreverent use of God's name, by cursing, or customary swearing, and take heed of the neglect of his worship, or any thing belonging to it.

Tillotson.

3. Usual; wonted.

Ev'n now I met him

With customary compliment, when he,

Waiving his eyes to the contrary, and falling

A lip of much contempt, speeds from me.

Shakspeare.

CUSTOMED. † adj. [from custom.] Usual; common; accustomed.

No natural exhalation in the sky,

No common wind, no customed event,

But they will pluck away its natural cause,

And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs.

Shakspeare, K. John.

To wring the widow from her custom'd right.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

Adam wak'd, so custom'd.

Milton, P. L.

One morn I miss'd him on the custom'd hill. Gray, Elegy.
CUSTOMER. † n. s. [from custom.]

1. One who frequents any place of sale for the sake of purchasing.

One would think it Overdone's house; for here be many old customers.

Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

A wealthy pool takes more pains to hire

A flattering audience, than poor tradesmen do

To persuade customers to buy their goods.

Roscommon.

Lord Strut has bespoke his liveries at Lewis Baboon's shop: Don't you see how that old fox steals away your customers, and turns you out of your business every day?

Arbutnot.

Those papers are grown a necessary part in coffeehouse furniture, and may be read by customers of all ranks for curiosity or amusement.

Swift.

I shewed you a piece of black and white stuff, just sent from the dyer, which you were pleased to approve of, and be my customer for.

Swift.

2. A common woman. This sense is now obsolete.

I marry her!—What, a customer? Pr'ythee, bear some charity to my wit; do not think it so unwholesome.

Shakspeare, Othello.

3. A toll-gatherer; a collector of customs. Barret and Sherwood. This sense also, unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, is now obsolete.

That memorable example of Zacheus's conversion from his evil way of covetousness and extortion, as a common customer.

Montagu, App. to Cas. p. 134.

CUSTREL. † n. s.

1. A buckler-bearer, [Fr. constillier.] This word is sometimes written coistrel.

Every one had an archer, a demi-lance, and a custrel (as our history calls it, but being truly constillier) or a kind of ambulator, or servant belonging to him, besides three great horses for his own use.

Id. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 9.

Send her money, knight: if thou hast her not in the end, call me cut. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

14. A horse; a gelding; and perhaps the preceding definition, which is Dr. Johnson's, should be merged in this. The commentators on Shakspeare say, that cut there means a horse.

You lustie youths who nourish high desire,
Abase your plumes which make you look so big:

The collier's cut, the courtier's steed, will tire:

Even so the clark the parson's gaw: doth dig.

Gascoigne, Parad. of Dainty Devices, (1592.)

He'll buy me a white cut forth for to ride.

Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

15. CUT and long tail. A proverbial expression for men of all kinds; it is borrowed from dogs.

He will maintain you like a gentleman.

Ay, that I will, come cut and long tail, under the degree of a squire. Shakspeare, M. W. of Windsor.

At quintin he,

In honour of this bridealtee,

Hath challeng'd either wide countee:

Come cut and long tail; for there be

Six bachelors as bold as he.

B. Jonson, Underwood.

He dances very finely, and very comely,

And for a jig, come cut and long tail to him,

He turns ye like a top.

Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

- CUTANEOUS. adj. [from cutis, Latin.] Relating to the skin.

- CUTE. adj. [generally supposed to be a vulgar contraction of acute, Lat. acutus; but it may be the Sax. cuð.] Clever; sharp. Still used in the north of England.

- CUTICLE. n. s. [cuticula, Latin.]

1. The first and outermost covering of the body, commonly called the scarf-skin. This is that soft skin which rises in a blister upon any burning, or the application of a blistering-plaster: It sticks close to the surface of the true skin, to which it is also tied by the vessels which nourish it, though they are so small as not to be seen. When the scarf-skin is examined with a microscope, it appears to be made up of several lays of exceeding small scales. Quincy.

In each of the very fingers there are bones and gristles, and ligaments and membranes, and muscles and tendons, and nerves, and arteries, and veins and skin, and cuticle of a nail.

Bentley, Sc. f.

2. A thin skin formed on the surface of any liquor. When any saline liquor is evaporated to cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they conereted, floated in the liquor at equal distances in rank and file. Newton's Opt.

CUT

CUTICULAR. adj. [from cutis, Latin.] Belonging to the skin.

CUTH, signifies knowledge or skill. 'So Cuthwin is a knowing conquerour; Cuthred a knowing counsellor; Cuthbert, famous for skill. Much of the same nature are Sophocles and Sophianus. Gibson's Camden.

Were't not better
That I did suit me all points like a man?

A gallant cuttleax upon my thigh,
A boar-spear in my hand. Shakspeare, As you like it.

To the lodgements of his herd he run,
Where the fat porkets slept beneath the sun;
Of two his cutlash launch'd the spouting blood,
These quarter'd, sing'd, and fix'd on forks of wood. Pope.

Mores, in his curious dissertation on letter-founders, calls a cutlass, as it seems, a couteless, among the antique typographical ornaments. Warton, Notes on Milton.

CUTLER. n. s. [coutelier, French.] One who makes or sells knives.

A pautry ring
That she did give, whose peesey was
For all the world like cutler's poetry;
Upon a knife; love me, and leave me not. Shakspeare.

In a bye cutler's shop he bought a tenpenny knife: so cheap was the instrument of this great attempt. Wotton.

He chose no other instrument than an ordinary knife, which he bought of a common cutler. Clarendon.

CUTLERY. n. s. [from cutler.] The ware or articles which are made by cutlers.

So mutton cutlets, prime of meat. Swift.

CUTPURSE. n. s. [cut and purse.] One who steals by the method of cutting purses: a common practice when men wore their purses at their girdles, as was once the custom. A thief; a robber.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse. Shakspeare, Wint. Tale.

A vice of kings,
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

Was there no felony, no bawd,
A cutpurse, for burglary abroad? Tudibras.

If we could imagine a whole nation to be cutpurses and robbers, would there then be kept that square dealing and equity in such a monstrous den of thieves. Bentley, Sermon.

CUTTER. n. s. [from cut.]

1. An agent or instrument that cuts any thing; as, a stone-cutter.

Never saw I figures
So likely to report themselves; the cutter
Was, as another nature, dumb. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

He who is called the cutter, or dissector, with an Ethiopick stone cuts away as much of the flesh as the law commands.

Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 243.

2. A nimble boat that cuts the water. [So the low Lat. cota, a kind of ship. V. Du Cange in Cota. See Ware Cor.]

3. [The teeth that cut the meat.
The grinders are behind, nearest the centre of
n. because there is a greater strength or force required to meat than to bite a piece; and the cutters before, that they are ready to cut off a morsel from any solid food, to be unsubmitted to the cutters. Ray on the Creation.

CUT-THROAT. n. s. [cut and throat.] A ruffian; a murderer; a butcher of men; an assassin.

Will you then suffer these robbers, cut-throats, base people gathered out of all the corners of Christendom, to waste your countries, spoil your cities, murder your people, and trouble all your seas? Knolles.

Perhaps the cut-throat may rather take his copy from the Parisian massacre, one of the horrid instances of barbarous inhumanity that ever was known. South.

CUT-THROAT. adj. Cruel; inhuman; barbarous.

If to take above fifty in the hundred be extremity, this in truth can be none other than cut-throat and abominable dealing. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

The ruffian robbers by no justice aw'd,
And unpaid cut-throat-soldiers are abroad;
Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,
To save complaints and prosecution, kill. Dryden, Juv.

CUTTING. n. s. [from cut.]

1. A piece cut off; a chop.

The burning of the cuttings of vines, and casting them upon land, doth much good. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Incision.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you. Levit. xix. 28.

3. Caper; curvet; [from To Cut a Caper.]

"Some ladies make a better shew of their countenances in those dances, wherein are divers changes, cuttings, turnings, and agitations of the body, than in some dances of state and gravity. Florio's Tr. of Montaigne's Essays, p. 228.

4. Division, as of a pack of cards. See the eleventh sense of CUT.

It is here said, there has been much shuffling and cutting in England, and we do not understand what, or who is turned up trump. Hill's Lett. Lett. to him, (1659,) p. 206.

CUTTLE. n. s. [Lat. sepia, Sax. cutele.] A fish, which, when he is pursued by a fish of prey, throws out a black liquor, by which he darkens the water and escapes.

It is somewhat strange, that the blood of all birds and beasts, and fishes, should be of a red colour, and only the blood of the cuttle should be as black as ink. Bacon.

He that uses many words for the explaining any subject, doth, like the cuttle fish, hide himself for the most part in his own ink. Ray on the Creation.

CUTTLE. n. s. [from cuttle.]

1. A foul-mouthed fellow; a fellow who blackens the character of others. Hammer.

Away, you cutpurse rascal; you filthy bung, away: by this wine, I'll thrust my knife in your mouldy chops, if you play the saucy cuttle with me. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

2. A knife. The commentators on Shakspeare say that this was the cant expression for the knife used by sharpers, in Shakspeare's time, to cut the bottoms of purses; and that the preceding eloquence might allude to this term. But they were not aware that cuttle is a serious term, in use long before Shakspeare wrote.

Dismembering himself with a sharp cuttle.

Bale, Eng. Vol. (1550) B. ii. C. 2. b.

CUTWORK. n. s. [cut and work.] Work in embroidery.

 Evelyn, Gardener's Kal.

CYCLE. n. s. [cyclus, Latin; κύκλος.]

• A circle.

• A round of time; a space in which the same revolutions begin again; a cyclical space of time.

We do more commonly use these words, so as to style a lesser space a cycle, and a greater by the name of period; and you may not improperly call the beginning of a large period the epocha thereof. Holder on Time.

• A method, or account of a method continued till the same course begins again.

We thought we should not attempt an unacceptable work, if here we endeavour'd to present our gardeners with a complete cycle of what is requisite to be done throughout every month of the year. Evelyn's Calendar.

• Imaginary orbs; a circle in the heavens.

How build, unbuild contrive
To save appearances; how gird the sphere

There are extant in Greek, four books of cynologists, or venation.
[From the Greek, P. 104.] Having the qualities of a dog; currish; brutal; snarling;

It is probable for Diogenes his cynical slovenliness to trample on Plato's splendid garments with more pride than Plato wore them. Bo. Taylor, Artif. Hands, p. 104.

He doth believe that some new fangled wit (it is his cynical phrase) will some time or other find out his art. Howell, Lett. iv. 7.

A for wilder speech was that of the dog-philosophers, who term'd women necessary evils: of this cynical sect, it seems, was he, who would make "oxus" to be the anagram of "uxor."

CY'ICK. n. s. [κύϊκ(ε).] A philosopher of the snarling or currish sort; a follower of Diogenes; a rude man; a snarler; a misanthrope.

How vildly doth this cynick think? —
Yet you henceforth; henceforth, henceforth. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Without these precautions the man degenerates into a cynick, the woman into a coquette, the man grows sullen and morose, the woman more violent and fantastical. Adison.

CYNOSURE. n. s. [from κύων dog.] The star near the North-pole, by which sailors steer

Their compass also is defective; — nor is the magnet, till of late, known amongst them; having the cynosure and west minor for their best direction. See T. Herbert, Trav. p. 377.

For the guidance either of our caution, or liberty in matters of borrowing and lending, the only cynosure is our charity.

Ep. Hall, Cases of Conscience
Towers and battlements it sees,
Bosom'd high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes. Milton, Il Pens.

CYON. See CION.

Gather cyons for grasshoppers; the buds sprout. Evelyn.

CYPHER. n. s. [from cypher.] Skill in arithmetick.

Knows the law, and writes you six fair hands,
Lest clerk, and has his cyphering perfect. B. Jonson, Alch.

CYPRESS. [κypressus, Lat.]

Cyp is a tall strait tree, produced with great

CY'PAUS. n. s. [I suppose] from the place where it was made; or corruptly from cypress, as being used in murning. So far Dr. Johnson. It is most probably from Cypus, where it was originally manufactured. It was a kind of lawn or gaze; and is said to have been also made use of to sift things to the finest powder. It is variously written cypres, cipres, and cypius, and is of frequent occurrence in our old poetry. In Erondelle's French Garden, &c. 1605, the word is called crape: "Commen vendez vous cette piece de crespe? How sell you that piece of white cipresse?"
A thin transparent stuff.

Lawn as white as Cyp snow, Cypius black as Cyp snow. Shakespeare, Wint. Tale.

A cypius, not a hooin,
Hides my poor heart! Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Your picture — one half drawn
In solemn cypius, th' other cobweb lawn. B. Jonson, Epigrams.

All in a robe of *Cyp*est grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of Cypius lawn,
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.

Their ensigns wrapt in cypius. Milton, Il Pens.

Health, Chron. of the Civ. Wars, p. 412.

CYPRUS Wine.* Wine made in the island of Cyprus.

The rich Cyprian wine which is so much esteemed in all parts, is very dear. Pococke, Observ. on Cyprus.

CYST. n. s. [κύστις.] A bag containing some CYSTIS. n. s. morbid matter.

In taking it out the cyst broke, and shewed itself by its matter to be a melicris. Wiseman, &c.

There may be a consumption, with a purulent spitting, when the vomica is contained in a cyst or bag, upon the breaking of which the patient is commonly suffocated.

CYSTICK. adj. [from cyst, a bag.] Contained in a bag.

The bile is of two sorts; the cystick, or that contained in the gall-bladder, a sort of repository for the gall, or the hepa-tick, or what flows immediately from the liver. Arbuthnot.

CYSTOTOMY. n. s. [κύστις and τέμνω.] The act or practice of opening incysted tumours, or cutting the bag in which any morbid matter is contained.

CYTISUS.* n. s. A shrub, of which there are many varieties. See TREFOIL.

There tamarisks with thick-leav'd box are found;
And cytisus, and garden-pines abound. Copgrave.

CZAR. n. s. [a Slavonian word, written more properly czar.] The title of the emperour of Russia.

There were competitors, the czar of Muscovy's son, the duke of Newburg, and the prince of Lorraine.

Brown, Trav. p. 153.

CZA'RISH.* adj. [from czar.] Relating to the czar.

His czarish majesty dispatched an express. Tatler, No. 55.

CZARINA. n. s. [from czar.] The empress of Russia.

When Catherine Alexowna was made empress of Russia, the women were in an actual state of bondage. — Assemblies were quite unknown among them; the czarina was satisfied with introducing them, for she found it impossible to render them polite. Goldsmith, Ess. 22.
